had him sent directly to the hospital. I thought I might as well go along, too, and see him taken care of. It would be too late for me to get home to supper anyway. Before I left he had come to himself but was very weak, and lay back on the clean hospital bed as if it was a welcome rest. The next day I ran in to see him. "He is asleep, now," said the ward nurse, "but he was asking for you this morning." His face looked ivory white against the pillow.

"The doctor says he will die," the nurse whispered.

The Jew could not have heard her, but he opened his eyes. When he saw me he reached a giant hand over the quilt towards me.

"You have been kind to me," he said faintly. "I cannot repay you, but you can claim your reward. Strike down the man whose face the Lord has marked with a cross of blood!"

"His mind is wandering," the nurse said.

"He is the guilty man," the Jew went on, after a moment, as if there had been no interruption. "I have seen it in a vision. Strike him down, and claim the reward! It is your privilege, and your duty."

After that he seemed to sleep again, and in a few minutes I left him. That night he died. The nurse said he never spoke again. At first I thought I would write a story for the paper about it, but I didn't. I didn't seem to feel as if I wanted to. Newspaper men can't have much sensitiveness, but when I came to think about writing this "case" I found I'd rather not. So I didn't; and in time forgot about it.

Two years later I was sent out to the western part of the state to spell a man who had been reporting a long and sensational murder trial there. Some of the rest of my story will be remembered as made public through the papers at the time, but much of it was hushed up by the friends of the family.

An elderly man of wealth had been found dead in his office. His confidential clerk had been arrested and was being tried for the crime, many people said because no one else could be found to accuse. He seemed an honest young man, but somewhat wild; and acknowledged that he had been drinking on the day and evening of the tragedy, of which he steadfastly declared he knew nothing. There was none but purely circumstantial evidence, and a brother of the dead man offered a reward of $1000 and finally raised it to $5000, for any positive proof of the crime.

I had never seen any of the parties in the case, and when Court assembled the first morning I was there and naturally watched them with interest as they came into the court room. The prisoner seemed a decent-looking fellow, but you never can tell. Another reporter who had been there longer told me who the folks were as they came in.

"That is the murdered man's brother," he said. "The one who has offered the reward." The man he pointed out stood near the door, talking to some one there. I could see only his profile.

When he turned I saw on his right temple a deep red birthmark in the form of a cross!

In an instant the scene in the hospital came back to me. The giant hand reaching out across the quilt; the far-seeing eyes in the ivory-colored face upon the pillow.

"Strike down the guilty man, whose face the Lord has marked with a cross of blood! Strike and claim the reward! It is your privilege, and your duty."

How I got through the next two days, and worked, I hardly know. It was fortunate for my paper that the trial then was dragging along in a desultory way, and that there was really very little to report. At the end of the second day the man whom I had spelled came back. He was a much older man than I, with years of experience, and he had always been a good friend to me. I told him my story and asked him what to do. I had been ordered to return to Boston on the midnight train, that night.

"Let me think," he had said. Then he lighted a cigar and began to walk up and down our room at the hotel.

"It is a chance," he said, finally, "but I think you ought to take it, both for your own sake and for ——'s," naming the prisoner. Then, looking at his watch, "you come with me. I think we have time now."

As we walked through the town he told me what to do, and when we stopped before a large and handsome house, said:

"This is where the brother lives—the man with the red cross on his face. I have been here several times in the evening to see him. Ask for him and the servant will show you into the study. I will tell the servant that I will wait in the hall. I shall be within easy reach of you."

I went in. The man I had come to see met me cordially. He had had much experience with newspaper men of late, he said, adding, "sad experience."

That gave me just the chance to lead up to what we had planned for me to say and I replied:

"No doubt; but I think your experience with me will be different from that with any of the others, for," looking him square in the eye, "I have come to accuse you of the murder of your brother, and to claim the reward of $5,000 which you offer."

It was a chance shot, and I felt as a man must who has fired a cannon ball at short range against what may be wood, or may be armor from which the shot will rebound to his own destruction.

This shot struck wood. The man started to deny me, but his lips made no sound. He put his hands to his face and sank back into the chair from which he had risen to meet me. I called softly to my companion, and he came in. When the man in the chair uncovered his face he could speak, and said, quietly enough:

"It is true. I have known it must come out unless I could fix it on some one else. If you will send for the proper officer I will make a full confession."

My companion turned to me. "Go for ——," he said, naming the sheriff, "but do not hurry to get him back here. Stop on your way down and wire the night desk that I want extra copy for 'sports.' They will understand that, and the other boys here will not. It is half past ten, now."

When I left the room I heard him lock the door behind me. While I was gone he got an outline of the whole affair from the man locked in with him, and when I returned at midnight and a full confession was taken down, it was easy for him to fill in the details which would make a complete story. No other paper but ours had a line of it the next morning, and in view of its being so great a scoop we both felt justified in keeping back my personal connection with it, especially as the man's family begged us to do so.

The man died before he could be tried. When his estate was settled the executors, with the full consent of the heirs, quietly paid me the $5,000 which he had offered as a reward.

That is why I am not a reporter now.

A MODERN PRODIGAL.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY D. H. TALMADGE.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

THRASHINGTON, the wild one walked slowly along the street, his mind busy with a strange sensation. At intervals he stopped, looking about him, then breathed deeply and went on again.

"Same old town, same old air I suppose," he said to himself, "but it never made me feel like this before. I actually have a notion to run down to the old place and duplicate the foolishness of the prodigal son. I won't do it, of course, but the notion is mysteriously strong for some reason or other. Let me see; it must be fifteen years—a long time to be lost to one's family and one's country. Fifteen years without a word to tell whether they are living or dead, or whether I am living or dead, which is fully as important. I wasn't wholly to blame. Father treated me shabbily and mother, though she looked as if it annoyed her, wouldn't take my part. So I passed out. I said I would never come back again—that thenceforth it should be as if I were in my grave so far as they were concerned, and the old gentleman smiled incredulously when I said it, but so it has been. I wonder why I came back. Because I had the money and a whim probably. It certainly wasn't because of any mawkish sentiment. London is mine and I am London's. My family and my birth are mere circumstances. But—but the air is different, after all."

He paused again, looking about him and sniffing with just a suggestion of contempt. There was a restaurant at hand, and, yielding to the seduction of the odors that wafted from the open door, he entered. Seated at one of the little tables he continued his meditations—if such staccato-like thoughts are worthy of the title—and as he meditated the old spirit of bitterness gradually resumed its sway and he felt more natural, which was in reality more unnatural. He was once more the outcast, the conscienceless cause of a mother's sorrow and a father's anger, the disgraceful—no, not that; it was no disgrace to do as he had done; he had, in his stubbornness and waywardness, taken what he considered to be the best course, that was all. He had tried honestly, he told himself, to do his duty and they would not accept it. He hoped they had suffered as they had made him suffer, for he had in the earlier days of his exile, felt pangs beneath his pride. He never felt these pangs now. He believed he had forgotten the past until this morning when, under the stimulus of the new old air, memory had awakened. It alarmed him to find that it was not dead and he struggled with it and put it down. He would not speak the first word of reconciliation were they to prostrate themselves before him and implore him with their eyes. Thus he told himself, and thus he believed.

After a time the victuals he had ordered were placed before him. He contemplated the array a moment before beginning to eat.

"Biscuits," he mused, "real, old-fashioned biscuits such as mother—bah! there it is again. I'm becoming regularly soft. Everything in this confounded air says 'mother' or 'father.' It is disgustingly trying to a chap whose temper is naturally short, and—and who doesn't care a snap of his finger about mother or father. I'll ship back to England jolly quick if this state of thing continues, and I won't go on a cattle steamer as I did the first time either. It will drive me to disgracing myself, that's what it will do, the atmosphere softening up a fellow's resolution and the very biscuits nagging him with reminders of things he doesn't care to remember."

He pulled the biscuit apart viciously and put a portion into his mouth, chewing it rapidly.

"It's good anyway," he admitted; "I believe it's the best thing I've tasted for years."

The next mouthful he masticated more slowly, sinking down into his chair comfortably, and gazing dreamily through the window at the passing crowds. Once he straightened up and shook himself.

"I'm getting some sort of a spell upon me," he thought. "Can it be possible there is opium in this cookery?"

He half raised his hand to call the waiter, than relapsed, smiling at what he was about to do. The crowds surged through the street, the cable car bells clanged, people brushed him as they came and went, but he noticed them not. He finished one biscuit and took another, putting it to his lips as one who knows not what he does. The movements of his jaw were very slow now, and the hard look in his eyes was gone. He was thinking—thinking of the old home, passively, submissively, for the first time in fifteen years. The spirit of forgiveness was in his heart. His pride was humbled. He was like unto a child that bows under the rod and is penitent.

"Father was harsh, but he was not unjust," he thought. "I tried him beyond endurance. I was angry because he would have restrained me from doing harm—doing harm to myself—yes, only to myself. I can see it now. We were alike, father and I, and mother was meek and uncomplaining. Blessed be the meek—blessed be mother! Did she ever cry I wonder. I never thought of that before. I never saw her weep, and yet she seemed of the kind that should weep. It is strange I never thought of it. If she didn't give way to tears, with the provocation she had, she must have been a martyr. Poor mother! I can see her now, standing by the kitchen table while father and I had our last words like brutes. And he was her husband and I was her only child. She grasped the edge of the table so hard that the lines stood out on the back of her hand and the knuckles showed white. The other hand was at her throat. She was fixing her dress I thought—I thought—but I was blind, blind, blind! It was her heart that was choking her, and she said nothing! How sweet the apple blossoms were that morning! It must have been just this time of year. I went through the orchard when I left the old place, yet I did not note the fragrance, for my heart was hot with passion—did not think of it—till now—and it was years ago."

His eyes were half closed, and he was oblivious of the flight of time. A touch on the shoulder aroused him. The waiter feared he was ill. He placed a ten dollar note in the man's hand, and watched him as he deftly wended his way to the cashier's desk. Then he essayed to eat, but the meat and vegetables were cold, and he passed into the street, forgetful of his change. Outside, he stood for a time beneath the sign that hung above the door—an anchor, emblem of hope—and then, with a sudden resolve, he buttoned his coat about him and walked rapidly away.

* * * * * *

The village looked much as it had fifteen years before, but the faces were strange. Twice or thrice he saw people whom he knew, but they returned only an unrecognizing stare when he looked into their eyes, and he passed on silently—on past the row of stores, past the old mill and over the bridge, into the land of his infancy. At the orchard gate he paused, drinking in the fragrance of the blossoms.

"It smells wonderfully like the grace of God," he thought, impetuously forming the comparison without heed to its form. "I believe I've been hungry for it all these years without knowing it. What a poor fool I am, with all my money that I have been so proud of—what a poor, mistaken, deluded fool!"

He smiled sadly, and followed the familiar path to the house. No one was in sight. He rapped lightly upon the door. He was conscious of a thick feeling in his throat, and his hand trembled. Yet he was calm. He felt vaguely that he was no longer responsible for himself; some force against which he was powerless was carrying him forward, and he no longer thought of resistance. The door opened, and a woman—a stranger—appeared, asking in rasping accents what he would have.

"My name," he said simply, "is Thrashington."

"And mine," she returned briskly, "is Smith."

He looked at the hard, seamed face dumbly. The woman, taking alarm at the expression of his face, partially closed the door. He stepped forward quickly, putting out his hand to prevent the action.

"Madam," said he, "I beg of you not to be alarmed. It did not occur to me that my name would not be familiar to you. My father owned this place. I—I was born here. Can you tell me where my parents are?"

"I don't know much about the Thrashingtons," replied the woman. "We're strangers here, and—and what do you want to know about your own parents for anyway? I should think you had ought to know as much about them as anybody if you're a natural son."

He bowed his head, and the words he spoke were barely audible.

"I am not—I have not been a natural son."

There is nothing in the world so attractive to the spirit of pity as the spectacle of pride humbled. The woman's tones softened.

"I am sorry," she said, "but I can't tell you anything except what I've heard the neighbors say. It won't be pleasant for you. Still, I don't know but what you deserve it. Your father is dead, and your mother is cooking in an eating house in the city. Mr. Rawlins knew the owner of it and got her the place. I've heard him say it was called the Anchor Cafe, or something like that. Our folks always eat there when they go to town. My husband eat there the last time he was up, and——"

But Thrashington was already beyond reach of her voice, hurrying back to the railroad station. The woman stood in the doorway till he passed from sight.

"Poor boy," she thought, "he is paying for his foolishness."

Then she slammed the door.

THE Kola Plant CURES ASTHMA AND HAY-FEVER.

The Kola Plant.

Free. The African Kola Plant is Nature's Positive Cure for Asthma and Hay-fever. In the short time since its discovery this remarkable botanical product has come into universal use in the Hospitals of Europe and America as an unfailing specific cure for every form of Asthma. Its cures are really marvelous. Rev. J. L. Combs of Martinsburg, West Virginia, writes to the New York World, February 9th, that it cured him of Asthma of thirty years' standing and Mrs. E. Johnson of No. 417 Second St., Washington, D. C., testifies that for years she had to sleep propped up in a chair in Hay-fever season unable to lie down night or day. The Kola Plant cured her at once. Mr. Alfred C. Lewis, editor of the Farmers' Magazine, of Washington, D. C., was also cured when he could not lie down for fear of choking, being always worse in Hay-fever season. Many other sufferers give similar testimony, proving it truly a wonderful remedy. As the Kola Plant is a specific constitutional cure for the disease, Hay-fever sufferers should use it before the season of the attacks when practical, so as to give it time to act on the system. If you suffer from Asthma or Hay-fever, in order to prove the power of this new botanical discovery, we will send you one large case by mail entirely free. All we request in return is that when cured yourself you will tell your neighbors about it. It costs you absolutely nothing. Send your address to The Kola Importing Co., No. 1164 Broadway, New York.

How Roger Jerritt Raised the Mortgage.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY F. E. BURNHAM.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

ROGER Jerritt trudged along the turnpike, his hands thrust deep into the pockets of his dilapidated trousers, muttering the while to himself.

"Marse Puls'ver ain't done de Colonel no hurt," said the negro, doubling up his great fists, "he ain't never hurt nobody, an' I'd like to——"

"Hi there! Out of the road!" cried Colonel Lane, reining his horse, "do you want me to drive over you?"

Jerritt stepped mechanically to one side, glancing up at the carriage as it passed, and when it had gone shook his fist savagely after it.

Squire Pulsiver had mortgaged his estate to the Colonel and the unexpected had come to pass. The Colonel was anxious to add the Squire's plantation to his own, and the Squire, unable to meet his obligations, the Colonel had foreclosed, and after a week of fruitless scurrying around among his friends, trying to raise the necessary five thousand dollars, the Squire was about to surrender the estate which he had inherited from his father.

The last three days active preparations for leaving had been going on. Jerritt had assisted, moving about with a doleful countenance, far more disconsolate than the Squire himself, who was trying his best to be brave. And now Jerritt was off on the errand he dreaded most—to order Williams the teamster, to come for the first load of goods that afternoon, for somehow the Squire hated to go himself.

Jerritt stumbled as he entered the stable, catching the toe of his clumsy shoe on one of the cleats nailed down to keep the horses from slipping while entering or leaving the stable. Some one laughed but the negro did not notice the merriment.

"Marse Puls'ver wants yer to—send a—team—up afore noon," said Jerritt, approaching Williams.

No one laughed now. Somehow they all felt sorry for the faithful negro who had served the Squire all his life. They saw the great tears rolling down his cheeks and his broken voice touched their hearts.

"Yes, I'll be there all right, Rog," replied the teamster. "Keep a stiff upper lip my boy, may be there's better times ahead. Col. Lane is a rascal and I'd tell him so if he was here, this minute."

"Rog takes it mighty hard," said one of the men as the negro lumbered off. "He's quiet enough and always has been, but if I was in the Colonel's shoes I'd rather not meet him alone."

Meanwhile the Colonel returned home and left his team standing before the house, his wife seated in the carriage, awaiting his return from the library, intending to continue the drive.

Jerritt was slowly tramping home again, his eyes fastened upon the ground, his hands still deep in his pockets. The express from Nashville whizzed over the crossing twenty rods below the Colonel's mansion. Suddenly there was a wild clattering of hoof beats and Jerritt saw the Colonel's horse tearing down the road, the reins dragging in the dust.

An equestrian had left a spirited horse standing by the roadside less than two rods from where Jerritt was when the Colonel's team ran away. Quick as a flash the negro took in the situation. He saw the runaway and heard the scream of the Colonel's wife. Inside of five seconds he had mounted the fiery horse that he saw just ahead of him, and was off in hot pursuit of the vanishing carriage.

"Here, you black rascal!" yelled the owner of the steed, returning in time to see Jerritt digging his heels into the animal's ribs, "come back or I'll——"

The Colonel had seen his horse start, and running out of the house and into the street, interrupted the horseman's flow of words.

"The man's after my team, you imbecile," roared the Colonel, excitedly.

Jerritt, meanwhile, was getting all the speed possible out of his mount. Never had the horse known aught save kindness in the past and the furious kicks and blows goaded him on at a pace he had never shown before. On and on Jerritt flew, gaining perceptibly on the runaway, but with much ground yet to cover ere he could overhaul the Colonel's horse.

Suddenly the pursued showed a spurt of speed that quickly increased the distance separating him from Jerritt.

"Get! Get!" shouted the negro in his horse's ear, driving his heels furiously into the animal's flanks, beating him unmercifully with his hard hands.

And the horse did show what he could do. Maddened by the kicks and blows which Jerritt continued to shower upon his sleek sides, he bolted, and the manner in which he closed up the interval showed the metal of the horse.

"Hold on tight, missus!" shouted Jerritt as he passed the swaying vehicle. "Hold on tight! Tight!"

Like lightning the negro snatched at the horse's bridle as he rode neck and neck with the Colonel's horse. There was a short and sharp struggle for the mastery. With his left hand he reined his own mount until the animal reared upon his haunches; and with his right he yanked at the bridle of the Colonel's horse. A moment more Jerritt was master of the situation.

"Who are you, my brave man?" asked the Colonel, meeting Jerritt returning with the carriage and saddle-horse; he was near-sighted and he did not recognize the Squire's man.

Just then the negro remembered that which he had forgotten in the excitement of the moment. Remembered that before him was the man who was about to turn the Squire out of his house and for a moment he did not respond.

"Who am I?" he said, his voice rising, "I'll tell yo' who I am, Marse Lane, I'm Marse Puls'ver's nigger. What for yo' turn him out doors? He ever hurt yo'?"

"No, he hasn't done me any harm, Rog," said the Colonel, somewhat disconcerted, "but——"

"Then what for yo' take the ol' place away?" demanded Jerritt, interrupting the Colonel.

"Just a matter of business, Rog, business, that is all."

"Business!" cried the negro, with fine sarcasm, "yo' call business to turn ol' man out o' house an' home when he ain't done yo' no hurt? I wish I'd let yo' ol' trap gone to Jericho!"

"See here," said the Colonel, earnestly, "Rog, you have done me a good turn to-day. Let this unpleasant affair drop. What can I do for you in return? Rog I'll buy you if it costs me ten thousand dollars, buy you and set you free."

The Colonel was inclined to be forgetful at times and sometimes forgot all about there having been a war and that there were no more slaves.

"Buy me?" yelled Jerritt, "I'm free, Marse Lane, an' ef I wasn't I'd ruther be Marse Puls'ver's slave a hundred years than belong to yo' fo' a minute!"

"Sho!" said the Colonel, smiling at his own forgetfulness and Jerritt's loyalty to the Squire.

Then for a moment neither spoke. The Colonel looked at his wife in silence and a very tender light came into his grey eyes and a solitary tear fell on the reins which hung loosely on the Colonel's knees.

"Rog," said the Colonel at length, laying his hand on the negro's shoulder, "jump in here and ride to the house with me; I want to talk with you."

For a moment the indignant negro hesitated. What if the Squire should see him with the Colonel? What would he think? Thus Jerritt reasoned with himself, but finally he complied and together they rode back to the house.

The Colonel took a number of papers from a pigeon-hole in his desk and presently began to write. Jerritt sat opposite him awkwardly fumbling his hat.

"You can't read, can you, Rog?" said the Colonel placing a document within a long envelope and sealing it.

"No," said Jerritt, his heart bitter, "no, Marse Lane, an' I don't want to, neither. I'd ruther have a kind heart then read an' write like de pres'dent."

"Just so," replied the Colonel, soothingly. "Now take this letter to the Squire and don't lose it."

"What yo' sendin', Marse Lane?" asked Jerritt, a suspicion of something, he scarcely knew what, crossing his mind.

"Rog," said the Colonel, placing his hand kindly upon the negro's shoulder, "you thought me a hard man, and it was right, but there was a tender spot, and you found it. I don't hold anything against him now. He'll understand."

"Marse Lane, do yo' mean it?"

"Of course I mean it," said the Colonel, his eyes glistening, "and now go home, you baby."

Hurriedly Jerritt left the house, a great lump in his throat threatening to choke him ere he could reach home and lay the envelope in the Squire's hands. Never before had the sun seemed so bright as at that hour. Never before had the birds sung so sweetly. Everything was different than when he had left the plantation in the morning. Then, the birds sang because they were glad they were to be turned out, and the sun was glad, too. Now the birds sang more sweetly than ever because they rejoiced, knowing that all was well, and the sun rejoiced for a like reason.

A short distance from the house he overtook Williams' team, coming for the first of the goods.

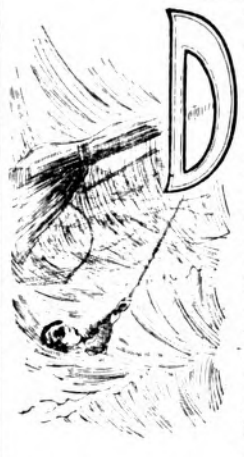
"Hi, there!" sang Jerritt, running ahead of the team, "stop yar hosses, Marse Williams. We ain't goin' away, de Colonel sez so!"

"What's this?" demanded the teamster, reining his horses. "Did Squire raise the money, Rog?"

"De mortgage is all settled, Marse Williams," said the negro, not telling his part in the adjustment. "Just turn yer hosses round. Yer ain't wanted."

"If that's so, Rog, I'm glad of it," said Williams, backing his team, to turn, "I'd rather lose the job ten times over than see the Squire go."

"What does this mean?" demanded the Squire, meeting Jerritt at the gate a moment later. "What did Williams turn back for?"



"What for', Marse Puls'ver?" said Jerritt, showing his white teeth, "'cause he ain't wanted. Marse Lane tol' me to hand yo' dis yere."

The Squire's hands trembled as he tore open the envelope and as he read a mist gathered before his eyes. When he had finished he looked a full minute into the honest face before him. Two tears rolled down his cheeks and as he grasped Jerritt's hand he did not trust himself to speak, but Roger understood.

FOILED.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY GEORGE A. BAKER.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

DON'T yer raise yer ugly hand to ther lad agin, or one of us will find a berth in Davy Jones' fleet!"

Old, grizzly, rough John Holland, able seaman aboard the Flying Fish, a trim clipper on her homeward voyage from Cadiz to Boston, spoke the words between his teeth, as with flashing eyes and heaving breast, he faced the ship's mate, Zenas Barker, who had cruelly struck a frail lad of but twelve years; a stowaway who had crawled out of his hiding place when two days out.

The mate had ordered the boy to the mast-head; but one look at the dizzy height caused him to pale and his body to shake as with the Chagves fever.

Holland had been the first one to discover the lad, and upon hearing his story had believed it and promised him his protection. In trembling tones he told the old sailor a story of a dead mother and a drunken stepfather, who beat him when he failed to bring him money to continue his maudlin sprees and sent him supperless to his bed of straw.

"Take that, you dirty brat!" roared the mate, as he saw the lad hesitate, striking him with his open hand.

"Obey orders or die!" and the brute raised his huge clenched fist when John Holland stepped out from a group of his mates who were interested spectators of the scene.

Barker's eyes flashed gloomy forebodings for the old sailor who had dared to beard the lion in his den.

The captain strode forward at this moment.

"What's up, Barker?"

"Holland's mutinied, sir."

"What! A mutiny aboard the Flying Fish? By the gods, man! you'll wish you'd never signed articles aboard this craft."

"Cap'n, I've never refused to obey an order, night or day, sence I've sailed with you. But if ther mate strikes thet boy for not going to the top, with his ugly fist, I'll—I'll kill him if I hez to swing for it."

And they who listened knew that John Holland meant it.

Calling to the mate the captain walked aft, and for a few minutes they conversed in low tones together.

"Now, Barker, the whole forecastle is back of the kid and Jack Holland, so we'd better go slow and watch our chance when he's off his guard. When the sharks are through with their feast there will be no tongues left to tell tales."

With a smile on his face the mate ordered Holland to go below and the steward to give the lad "a bite o' hoss."

"Be on your lookout, Jack. Ther cuss means yer an' ther lad no good," whispered Bob Harding, a young athletic member of the forecastle.

"Why didn't yer let him strike me, Jack? I'm used ter it, 'n et wouldn't got you inter trouble. You've bin the only friend I hez ever had, Jack, 'n' I'd ruther he killed me than you should git hurted." And the little chap placed both hands on Jack's knees and looked up in his face pleadingly.

The old sailor choked back a sob and dashed back the brine from his weather-stained cheek.

"Somehow, my lad, your comin' hez made old Jack better. It brings back other days when he wasn't at the beck and call of no man. My boy, ef I goes to Davy Jones you hez my trunk there 'n' so long's I'm here you'll stay with me."

After dusk, a few evenings later, the mate might have been seen stealthily creeping out on the bow-sprit, and after a sweeping glance backward, he slashed twice at the footropes and made his way back to the deck, hiding an ugly-looking sheath knife beneath a tarpaulin that lay in the cockpit.

When the hour of midnight was near at hand, as the murderous mate had carefully reckoned, a squall struck the ship nearly throwing her on her beam ends.

"All hands on deck! Holland git out there 'n' tie up that jibtops'l 'n' be d——n quick about it!" roared Barker, walking out to the heel of the bowsprit with a crafty look on his face.

Unsuspectingly Holland placed his weight on the weakened footropes and as the craft buried her knight-heads under the wall of seething foam, he was almost wrenched from his hold. After it had passed he stepped ahead, and as Barker saw his plans foiled by his not cutting deep enough into the ropes, he stepped over the bow and placed his burly form upon the partly severed strands.

At this moment a giant billow came thundering down on the ship and literally buried her in its depths. High above the roar of the storm arose the despairing cry of the mate, swept from his hold into the hissing, seething cauldron.

"They has both gone, but I see ther cuss of a mate jump ther ropes to throw Jack inter ther sea," said Bob Barnicle, scanning the foaming waters in hope to see a sign of his old messmate.

"There's Jack! Hooray! hooray!" they shouted, as the grizzly head of the old sailor was seen to rise on the crest of a comber and clutching the hanging footrope, he rapidly made his way, hand over hand to the deck, where willing hands assisted him to the forecastle. The stowaway sobbed and clung to his protector, who stood leaning against a berth, while the water flowed in little rivers from his soaked garments to the floor.

"When I felt myself goin' I thought I'd sailed my last v'y'ge," said Jack. "But somebody up aloft yonder was keerin' fer old Jack 'n' placed the rope in my fist 'n' I hung on like tar ter a nigger's heel."

It was useless to attempt lowering boats to save the mate, and the Flying Fish was put away on her course.

From that day the Captain was a changed man and his men wondered at his sudden fear and trembling whenever the mate's name was mentioned.

John Holland with his little savings is living in a quiet country village in Massachusetts, and carefully watches the progress of the "stowaway" in his studies at the village school and vows "ther lad shall have ernuff eddication to 'arn a livin' ashore."

JEAN.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

IN THE days of her prosperity, Madame Le Mer had been a person of consequence, and her tall, commanding figure and strong face had gone almost as far to inspire respect and obsequiousness as had the extensive cotton and sugar plantations which her husband owned on the borders of the Bayou Tinlier. But now the husband and the plantations and the prosperity were all things of the past, and Madame's soft, thick hair was as white as the cotton which had once made her name familiar to the brokers and merchants of lower Palafox Street; and under the relentless weight of years and affliction, her tall figure had become bowed, tremulous, and her strong face had grown wrinkled and sad and retrospective. The friends and acquaintances of her prosperity had drifted away with her falling fortunes, and now the only reminder of her former state was the title of Madame, and the respect it conveyed. Even the rich bourgeois who gave her washing and plain sewing spoke of her courteously as "Madame." Many of them did not know why; only, the old families did it, and, besides, there was a certain air of distinction about the tall, bowed figure that unconsciously commanded their deference.

Time was when the Le Mer family had had many representatives; but the war had taken some, and the fever had taken some, and the rest had followed the vanishing prosperity of the house and gradually been lost sight of. Now, there were only Madame and her tall, big-eyed grandson in the whole city. They lived in a shabby, two-room house near the wharves, and Madame washed and ironed and sewed, and Jean sold papers and ran errands and did chores, and between times he went to the public school on the corner; and in the evenings, when there was no work and no public school, his grandmother taught him from the lore of her own studious days in the pension in far away France.

At fourteen, Jean was already dreaming and planning for his future. He would be a physician and surgeon, like his father; and he would own cotton and sugar plantations and be good to everybody, just as his father had been. Only he did not say much of this to his grandmother. One day when he had mentioned it she had caught him to her with a wild, passionate "Non, non, mon cher! mon petit fils! N'oubliez pas votre pere! You are all that I have, little Jean, mon enfant! You must never leave me. Surely le bon Dieu can not ask more."

Since then Jean had kept his ambition to himself. He helped provide the few necessities for the house, and bought little luxuries for his grandmother; and even after these expenditures, was able to save occasional pennies from his papers and errands and chores to purchase books on the science he loved. As he grew older he longed for an opportunity to go away to the great medical schools, as his father had done. He worked harder, and began to store up dollars instead of cents; only, as his hoard increased, he would discover that his grandmother's clothing was getting shabby, or that there was some expensive food or cordial in market that would please her, and then his money would melt away. But it did not matter, he would tell himself consolingly, la grandmere was getting old and needed these things; there was plenty of time.

So he saved more money, and spent it for la grandmere; and hoarded again, and again lavished it on la grandmere. But all the time he was working and studying and thinking. He bought books when he could, and he borrowed books and pamphlets from the free library and from an old physician who was becoming interested in him. And this same old physician took him to the hospital and explained cases; and occasionally, even allowed him to assist in the work. At eighteen, Jean had a general knowledge of hospital practice, and his untrained course of reading had been modified and made useful by the advice and companionship of the old physician. But there was much yet for him to learn, and more and more he realized the necessity of spending a few years in a good medical college.

He was earning steady wages now as clerk in a drug store; but la grandmere was getting more feeble, and every day there were new things to be purchased for her comfort. The college was a long way off, but it would come, he told himself, confidently. Some day la grandmere would see the future as he did, and then her strong, true self would be the first to bid him go. For the present, he was young and could wait; he would not urge matters. La grandmere had suffered—ah! le bon Dieu knew how she had suffered. Few women were called upon to sacrifice husband and sons and brother in one short week. Non, non; he would not urge matters.

Every year there were rumors of yellow fever in the city, but only once or twice in a lifetime did it become the tidal wave of death which had desolated la grandmere's life. Jean had been only a child then, but each year it was brought home to him by the mute terror which the rumors brought into the dear old eyes. At such times he would draw her to him and promise never to leave without her consent.

The old physician had been a classmate of his father's, and had always treated la grandmere with tender deference and sympathy. One day he met Jean on the street and told him that he must not return to the hospital; there were cases of fever just brought in, and it would not be safe. So Jean waited, and a few days multiplied the cases to twenty; and then a few more days, and the city was hushed in the apprehension of a great terror. Business ceased, and those who were able fled to the hills, to the North, out to sea, anywhere to get away from the plague. The hospital was soon full, and there were not enough physicians and nurses to look after them; then new buildings were levied upon for the temporary use of patients; and then—the whole city become a hospital.

Jean had been working day and night at the drug store, but that was not enough. He had a fair knowledge of medicine, and there was a woeful lack of physicians and nurses. An appeal had been made to the country at large; but it would take time for volunteers to arrive, and just now every moment was precious. He left the drug store and went home.

"Thank God you are come, Jean," cried la grandmere, fervently, as he entered, "I have been counting up our money, and we have twelve dollars. It will take us back among the hills. We can get along some way, mon cher, and at least you will be safe."

But Jean threw his head back and looked at her silently; and la grandmere, after one swift, agonized glance at his set face, fell back into her chair with a low cry.

"I feared it would be so, mon petit fils, mon pauvre petit fils," she moaned. "Le bon Dieu has dealt severely with me, and I hoped that He would let this pass. "Non, non," as he was about to speak, "I know what you would say. There are hundreds dying, and no one to minister to them. You would give your life—ah, mon Dieu! I know it is right. I have been through it before, and gave all I had. But it was hard, mon petit Jean. I am an old woman now, and not so strong as I was when your father and two boy uncles came and looked at me as you do now. Not one of them came back to me, little Jean—not one. Ah mon Dieu! mon pauvre petit fils!" She rocked to and fro, and obeying a sudden impulse Jean sprang to her side and threw his arms across her shoulders.

"Non non," he whispered, "I will not leave you. We will go back among the hills."

Madame shivered as though from a blow; and as she rose slowly from her chair there came to her face the same strong, resolute expression which Jean remembered to have seen far back in his childhood.

"It is right that you should stay, Jean," she said, simply. "I knew it all the time, but I was weak. May le bon Dieu overlook our frailties. "Oui," in answer to his look, "you may leave me now. They need you more than I. But hold me close once more, little Jean; we may never see each other again. Now, gardez vous bien!"

She was standing firm and erect when he looked back at her from the door; then he turned away, and gave himself and his thoughts to the duty before him.

Madame scarcely left her room during the terrible weeks that followed. Occasionally she heard hushed whispers along the sidewalk; and, every morning, the dull rumble of the dead cart, stopping here and there on the street to pick up its silent passengers. She did not listen for the footsteps of Jean; she had given him up.

Rumors reached her of physicians and nurses dying at their post, and of the gradual extension of the plague to other coast cities; but she scarcely heeded. She had given up her future, and now she was gradually falling back into dreaming of the past.

One day slow, uncertain footsteps shuffled along the sidewalk, and then the door opened and Jean stood before her, big-eyed and emaciated.

"The plague has run itself out," he said, wearily. "They have no further use for me."

Madame looked at him wonderingly, incredulously; then, as she caught him in her arms a look of ineffable joy drove the expression of stony resignation from her face.

"De bon Dieu has blessed me," she said, reverentially, "even while I was censuring him. 'N'oubliez pas, mon petit fils.'"

CAMPING OUT.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

AMONG Indians, camping out is not a recreation, but a practical necessity. As game becomes scarce in one section, camp is moved to another; from river to lake, and from open country to forest, back and forth, as the exigencies of season and game demand. The life is hardy and is conducive to strong lungs and fleet limbs and clear eyes, and there is an exhilaration and fascination about it that appeals strongly to the imagination. The camp-grown brave who is afterwards "civilized" in some Eastern college, is more than apt to return to the free, untrammelled life as years crowd in upon him. Civilization is a shutting in from nature, and while it adds to comfort it inevitably circumscribes and dulls the imagination.

This becomes more and more appreciated as nations advance in civilization. The camp gives way to the cabin, and this to the encompassing walls and confined atmosphere of later dwellings. Then comes the long quest of awakening ambition, fortune, achievement, education, or whatever it may be—and this in a measure obtained, the wearied adventurers pause and gaze back over the trail they have conquered. Then with this first leisure comes a surging of the nomadic instincts they had thought subjugated, and they have a longing for the woods and fields, and for the wild, free animal life they had all but forgotten.

The new purposes and the old unconventional existence, are incompatible; but like labor and sleep, the one may be made stronger by the frank recognition of the other. Every year new recruits are added to the army of campers, and whether the tarrying beside still waters or among towering peaks be for a week or month, the brain and muscle laborers return to their work with renewed strength and reinvigorated purpose. There is a tonic among the balsamic pines and on the breezy lakes that physicians are quick to appreciate and prescribe, and everywhere it is becoming more and more understood that the most salutary drug is the one administered by homeopathic nature.

Already we are fast becoming a race of campers and now there is scarcely a student or a clerk, a business man or a man of leisure, but must have his outing; and it is lengthened from days to weeks, and from weeks to months, according to occupation and inclination. Every ocean beach and inland lake has its tents and camp paraphernalia, and every clear running stream and forest covert its angler or amateur hunter or explorer.

After the discovery of gold in California, when the great rush to that region set in, camping out was a regular feature of the everyday life of the white man in the far west; and again during the four years from 1861 to 1865, the stern reality was experienced of a million men lodging in tents or upon the ground in the open field.

As a recreation in the United States, camping out seems to have begun on the sandy beaches of the ocean coast of New England, and thence to have extended to the picturesque inland lakes and ponds and river banks, and to the isolated recesses and plateaus of the mountains. Farmers took their families to the shore for a day's clam-bake, or a week's camping and fishing; overworked business men sought health and rest in the open air; students and school boys began to look forward to spending their long vacations in the woods and along the shore; and then—like a great tidal wave—almost everybody, from coast to forest recess and from valley to mountain top, began loading tents, provisions, camp kettles and fishing tackle into boats or wagons preparatory to setting out on their summer vacation.

Nor has the movement toward camp life been confined to boys and young men alone. The relaxation it offers overwrought nerves appeals to grown men and matrons, even as the marvelous and romantic side appeals to young girls. There is a freedom from restraint in the experience that is peculiarly attractive to those whose lives have been circumscribed by set rules, and no one who has spent a night in camp on the bank of some moonlit lake, or upon a mountain side that overlooks hills and valleys and plains, can ever forget the magical beauty of the landscape as night closes down and the weird light of the blazing camp fire flares out among the trees and encompassing shadows.

GOLDEN MOMENTS, Augusta, Maine.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

OF the most trying things relative to dress, during the summer, is the effort to keep one's head stylishly and freshly covered. Floral hats, no matter how seductive they may appear, no, nor how much they may cost, are bound to fade and grow pale and wan under the scathing rays of the summer sun, and of course when their freshness is gone their beauty has vanished. Which only goes to prove that no matter how enticing flower hats are they are not for the woman who cannot afford a number of changes. Tulle hats come under the same ban as to durability. The first dampness and they are as limp as a rag, and their beautiful crispness reduced to a thing of horror; yet they are the most becoming things we have worn in many a day, and if worn with a due amount of discretion can be made to do duty the greater part of the summer. The most serviceable of all hats for country wear have been those of mull in white or pretty light colors, shirred over a wire frame and heavy with great masses of bunched mull with sometimes an osprey or stiff aigrette as ornament. Then there are the hats of yellow or dead white straw trimmed with wheat and field flowers with very often a smart bow of black velvet ribbon to give a touch of color. Leading milliners have been trying all summer to force the bonnet string or tie on many of the smartest hats, but as a usual thing have failed utterly. Occasionally a face is found to whom the tie of tulle or black velvet is becoming but it is a rarity, the general effect being to add to one's age.

AN ODD SILK WAIST.

As midsummer advances the toque in all its forms is appearing, offset by the beloved picture hat without which the summer girl is lost. Many of them are composed entirely of black tulle, or its substitute, mousseline de soie, shirred so closely as not to be at all transparent, and trimmed with large ball choux of the material.

This is the season when economical women are having their tailor gowns for the fall and winter built. They seize this opportunity when work is scarce to have their gowns made much less than would be the case a month or two later when all the feminine world is rushing pell-mell to their modistes and they are shoulder deep in work. One woman I have in mind, who thinks nothing of paying $150 for a plain tailor-made, has taken time by the forelock, and has arranged for her gown this month to be just as elegant as usual, at a reduction of $50 (no small consideration) because the season is so early, and work rather scarce. I was so fortunate as to see the design for her gown which is quite Frenchy in tone and reveals the trend of the coming fall styles. The material is medium weight Scotch cheviot in a mixture of creamy tan, golden brown and black, the whole effect being a soft, warm brown. The skirt is as clinging as ever, I might say even more so, and needs to be patted and coaxed into wrinkleless perfection about the hips, from where it falls in graceful lines well onto the floor, although somewhat shorter than has been the case this season. Grace is the one thing needful, so says the French designer, and to this end all the dressmakers strive. This skirt has an equestrien back, fitting snugly without being too tight, opening down one of the front seams, under the narrow band of brown velvet which ornaments it. The smart little coat is exceedingly short, and perfectly tight fitting, with rounded corners, and perfectly flat over the bustle, all its edges bound with the golden brown velvet, the small revers as well, while the collar has an all-over facing of it. The entire gown is lined with a warm shade of golden brown satin, so soft and silky and clinging.

AN EFFECTIVE COAT.

A novel design about to be made up in pinkish tan cloth is la Princess, the perfectly fitting bodice and skirt merging into one, and buttoned down the whole length of the front from the shoulder to the foot of the skirt, with enameled buttons matching the color exactly. Across the bust is draped heavy black lace, simulating an Eton jacket, with narrow pleatings of black mousseline de soie as an edging. The sleeves are plain and snug, while the collar is extremely high and built of black lace.

Large and small scallops bound with velvet, or plain on the edges are used in profusion on many of the soft wool gowns being worn now for the first time. Sometimes a small button accentuates the points or narrow fancy braid outlines it.

Fringes are more popular then they have been for a number of years, and are being sold in the shops in all widths and in every imaginable color to match all the newest cloths. The present fancy is to use several widths of fringe on the same gown, the deeper for the skirt, the narrower for the bodice. A very pretty guimpe is shown having an inch wide fancy heading with a narrow half-inch fringe finishing it, to be used in rows on the deep circular flounce, so becoming to so many figures.

OF NUN'S VEILING.

A dainty model in soft nun's veiling is shown here, having a fichu of mull exactly the same tint, and trimmings of narrow black velvet ribbon.

Separate waists are always a pleasure, and here is an entirely new design, simple but effective. It fits the figure softly, with no fitting seams save those under the arms; the trimming consists of ribbon quilling set on in scallops. The shirt sleeves are finished with a flaring cuff at the hand.

An effective little coat for cool days is shown here, built of heavy white flannel with no lining, and finished with straps on the edges.

POISONS FOR PLANTS.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE question of the poisoning of soils by mineral poisons, used to kill insect and disease-producing fungi, is exciting the attention of the government Bureau of Vegetable Pathology at Washington, and experiments are being made with a view to ascertaining how far danger may arise from such causes.

What is known as Bordeaux mixture, for example, is composed of sulphate of copper and slacked lime. Constantly sprayed upon plants, it must deposit a certain amount of the metallic salts in the soil, which, not being dissolved and carried away by water, would necessarily accumulate and form in the course of time a source of peril not to be overlooked. Though no data exist upon which a reliable estimate can be made, it is imagined that a soil subjected continually to a sprinkling of the kind might become unsuitable for crops in the course of 100 years, the food plants raised on the land absorbing enough copper to injure consumers.

Again, Paris green, so commonly employed for destroying potato bugs and other noxious insects, is composed of arsenious acid and copper salts; in effect, it is a mixture of copper and arsenic—both of them deadly poison. Most of the Paris green that is put on potato plants is strewn upon the leaves and not on the ground, but eventually the plants and their leaves are plowed into the soil, which thus takes up considerable quantities annually. Here likewise there is an obvious danger.

The properties of arsenic as an irritant poison are sufficiently well known. It often happens that people are sickened by this mineral in the wall-paper of the rooms they occupy. One of the worst features of the poisoning that is apprehended from soils in the manner suggested is that it would go on very gradually, so that the people attacked by it would have no notion as to the cause of their ailments. Consequently, the latter would not be successfully diagnosed by physicians in most instances, and the application of antidotes would not suggest itself.

That copper has caused death is disputed. Its salts act on the human system as a violent emetic, and on that account they are not usually dangerous; but the metal has a tendency to accumulate in the body, especially in the liver, and with old and sickly people it is likely to cause functional derangements. Workers in copper absorb it until they become so saturated with it that their eyes sometimes turn green.

Some authorities have claimed that copper is a normal constituent of many foods. More or less of it is found in the bodies of numerous animals, being originally derived from plants whose roots absorbed the salts of the metal from the soil in which they grew. A noteworthy instance is that of an African bird called the "turaco," which feeds on plantains. Its wing-feathers are colored red by a pigment containing six per cent. of copper, which is undoubtedly derived from plantains. Most of the common vegetables reveal on analysis traces of copper, and the metal is usually discovered in minute quantities in the liver and kidneys of human beings.

Much interest, therefore, attaches to the experiments being made by the experts in Washington, who are treating various kinds of soils with regular doses of Paris green, Bordeaux mixture, and other substances of the sort in common use by farmers and horticulturists. After a while, specimens of the soils will be analyzed in order to find out just how much poison they contain, and a reckoning will be made with the idea of ascertaining for how long a time such poisons can be applied without involving danger. It is feared that, unless some precautions are taken in this matter, whole populations at a future period may be sickened by plant-foods containing perilous percentages of metallic salts.

A POCKET LUXURY

Is a tortoise shell comb in a neat and fancy case, always handy and useful; good for men, women, school children and the soldiers. We will send one with our great catalogue of thousands of bargains for only six cents. Address, Comfort, Augusta, Maine.

The Director-General of Agriculture of Belgium has issued an order that all animals of the bovine species which have attained the age of three months shall thereafter always wear earrings. This is not intended for the ornamentation of the beasts, especially, but is a hygienic measure, intended to prevent the introduction into Belgium of any animals suffering from tuberculosis. Breeders are obliged to keep an exact account of all animals raised by them, and the ring (on which is engraved a number) is fastened in the animal's ear in the hope of thereby preventing the substitution of one animal for another.

A LADY TELLS HOW SHE SUPPORTS HERSELF AND FAMILY.

"I often read of ladies who work hard trying to earn enough to keep body and soul together and for their benefit I will relate how easily one can get along in the world if they only know how. There is a big firm in Pittsburg that manufactures flavoring powders. I had tried them myself and knew they were splendid, so sent for samples and tried selling them. I found it so pleasant and easy that I have kept right at it and never make less than $3 a day and often clear more than $5. The powders go twice as far as the liquid extracts sold in stores and are much stronger. I sell from one to eight different flavors in each house. They are used for ice cream, custards, cakes, candies, etc., and are so delicate and give such a rich flavor that everywhere I go I gain a permanent customer. Those of your readers who would like to make money can get full particulars by writing to W. H. Baird & Co., 213 Telephone Bldg., Pittsburg, Pa., who will give you a good start. I support myself and family nicely and we have a good many comforts we never had before." "L"

CONDUCTED BY EVERETT G. WHEELMAN.

THERE is no end, apparently, to the minor inventions that are being patented for the use of bicyclers. The patent office records, both in this country and Europe, show a marked activity in the line of bicycle attachments, construction, details, fixtures and applications of the bicycle principle. Not a week passes but that there are numerous patents granted in this field, the number being only comparable, perhaps, to electric patents generally.

Leopold Bernheimer of New York has added a device to the bicycle lamp by which pedestrians can tell at a glance whether the light they see pointing at them is on a bicycle at rest or in motion. It consists of a disc of colored glass, preferably red, in front of the lantern lens. When the wheel is in motion this is rapidly rotated by a wind wheel operated by the wheel's passage through the air. When the wheel is at rest the interrupter is also still.

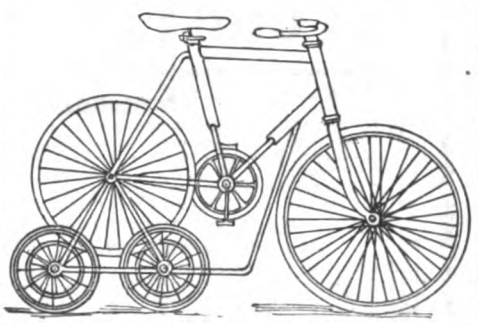
Roller skates with pneumatic tires, although several years old have made little progress in America, but there are several patterns on sale in the athletic goods stores. They are designed for over hill and dale and not merely for recreation upon the smooth floor of a rink. The wheels are three inches in diameter and an expert can make a speed of ten miles an hour over a sidewalk or country road of average smoothness and firmness.

Another novelty is a rawhide-covered link chain. The rawhide cover is applied to the surface of the links and held in place with clamping blocks secured to the opposite sides for the purpose of affording greater traction between the individual links and the sprocket wheel.

A puncture proof tire is claimed to be obtained by the combination of a flexible outer cover and a puncture proof shield inclosing an ordinary rubber tire. The shield consists of a layer of cork around the periphery of the rim and the circumference of the inflated tire, with a layer of celluloid on the top of the cork and a waterproof cement uniting the two. Outside of this is the flexible outer rubber covering which is attached to the rim proper. A composition for repairing leaks in punctured tires is described in another patent as composed "of a heavy, nonoleous liquid consisting partly or entirely of glycerine and containing a gelatinous mineral substance in suspension."

Something to suit the tastes of the crack-a-jacks and that numerous army who fancy uniqueness in all things is to be found in the designs of a new set of handle bars. Ever since the ram's horn handle bars made their appearance, their shape has become more and more exaggerated, but it would seem that these bars are extravagant and striking enough in their outline to please even the most exacting fiend.

A Brussels, Germany, man has invented a bicycle frame that is not rigid. The saddle post stands upright from the crank axle. At its base two strong steel springs are securely attached which bend outward and are fastened to the front and rear forks respectively by metal rods. The entire fore part of the frame is independent of the rear part, and when riding over rough ground the jars and shocks are taken up absolutely by the springs in the wheel. People who have tried it claim that it is the easiest-riding wheel that they have ever used, and its construction is strong and durable, although it is built as lightly as the ordinary rigid-frame bicycle.



A bicycle built on the principle of the Holman Locomotive has been conceived by a Chicago groceryman. He went to work with such tools and materials as came handy and got together a rough wheel which he says has demonstrated the soundness of his conclusions. "Of course the principle is not mine," he says, "but I am the first man to think of applying it to a bicycle and as such the patent office has protected my rights. What I claim is that any average rider can make from forty to fifty miles an hour on this style of wheel while riders of the same class are going fifteen or twenty miles on the ordinary safety. The increase in speed brings no increase in exertion—it is as easy to pedal forty miles an hour on a friction wheel as it is to run ten miles on those now in use."

His latest wheel is of the chainless variety; the power is obtained by a smooth-faced pedal wheel revolving against a large driving wheel, which in turn imparts motion to the ground wheels.

A cycling amateur photographer recently exhibited his combined bicycle pump and camera holder and his bicycle tripod. The former is an ordinary pump fitted with screw threads at the large end while the nipple of the rubber tube is screwed and fits in the brass nut in the camera. The tripod consists of an extension foot hinged to the frame and, when not in use, suspended from a hook placed for the purpose beneath the saddle.

Then there is the convertible tandem shown in the cut. This machine is jointed in such a way that it is readily taken apart and used as a tandem or as a single wheel. When this comes onto the market, what a convenience it will be for the family man!

After patenting all the individual parts of a bicycle hundreds of times over, the bicycle inventor has turned his attention to the costumes to be worn, which have been similarly treated. The large number of women's garments patented and, strange to relate, most of them by men, should surely bring forth the much sought ideal garment before long. Men's clothing not being so complicated or requiring such delicate and exact adjustment of parts, has not received such extended attention, but the patented convertible trousers shown embody a good idea. This patent covers an internal circular cuff united to each leg below the knee of the ordinary long trousers to cover the inseams and constitute a contracting band with the trousers when the latter are turned up. On doubling up the bottoms of the trousers legs several times the final roll renders the cuff external, causing it to appear on the outside, thus giving the finished appearance of knickerbockers with golf extensions.

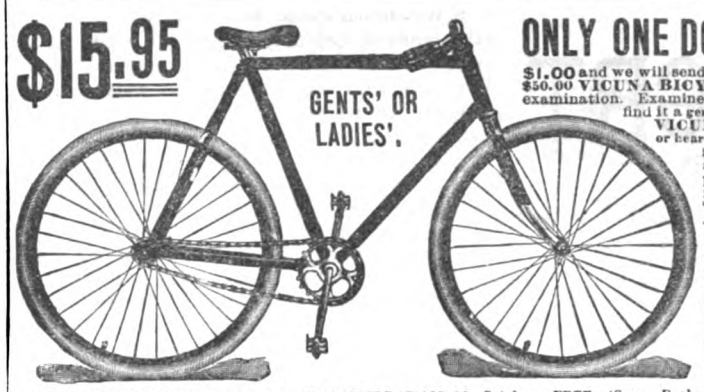
THE BELIEF in the magic power of precious stones dates back to ancient times.

The Shah of Persia always wears a cube of amber around his neck, and among other properties it is supposed to have the power of rendering its wearer invisible. It is said to have fallen from heaven in the time of Mahomet.

Disraeli wore a ring set with a sardonyx, which is supposed to bestow the gift of eloquence.

Upon the birth of every Rothschilds girl baby six pearls are purchased, each costing five hundred dollars, and upon each birthday six more pearls are added, so that when the young lady is of an age to make her bow to the world she has a magnificent collection of pearls.

A CONTROVERTIBLE TANDEM.



The Emperor of Germany wears agate, which is said to insure long life, health and prosperity.

In one of the most beautiful parks at the Spanish capital there is a statue of the patron saint, and around the neck of the statue there is a chain from which is suspended a most beautiful ring of pearls and diamonds. The ring was made for the present king's father, and he gave it to his first wife, Mercedes, for a betrothal ring. She died soon after her marriage. The ring then went to Queen Christina, who soon died, and then it was given by the king to his sister who died within the month. The ring than passed to the daughter of a Duke, and in less than three months she, too, lay dead. The king then put the jewel into his own treasure box, and before the year was out he was dead. It was then thought best to put the ring out of the family altogether, and so it was hung around the neck of the statue of the patron saint, and it does not need a guardian, as it is looked upon with horror by all, and no one could be induced to appropriate it.

IT is interesting to note the prices which the government paid for the private yachts it bought during our war with Spain. The Penelope, afterwards called the Yankton, cost $125,000. Mark Hanna's "Commanche", afterwards called "Frolic" cost $115,000. The Merrimac, $342,000; The Mayflower cost the government $430,000. The Corsair afterwards the Gloucester, $225,000. The Scorpion, $300,000. The ambulance ship Solace was purchased for $600,000. The Harvard and Yale were the ocean liners New York and Paris, and for the use of these two boats Uncle Sam paid $2000 a day throughout the whole war.

WALKING fish are certainly a rarity—and yet the London naturalists have at last captured some. They were first found in a dry place and were thought to have been left there by the tide; further observation, however, showed that the fish came there voluntarily; they leap from stone to stone, as a frog does, but do not resemble a frog, as they are about the size of a small English minnow, and have two very strong breast fins, which they use as propellers.

August marks the tercentenary of the great Flemish artist Vandyck. A special issue of postage stamps has been made and a great exhibition of his most celebrated paintings is to be seen at the Hague. No royalty that he painted is so charming as the fair young queen who leads her subjects in showing honor to the painter on this three hundredth anniversary.

Henry Ward Beecher once apostrophized August as the "Fire month." It has lost none of its old time reputation but the American people have begun to realize that we have a tropical climate for a few months in the year. By dressing, living, working and eating up to that idea they have a much greater degree of comfort than in the days when the summer vacation was an unknown quantity.

A recent scientific proposition is the building of houses of glass. These are so hard as to be practically indestructible and he who lives in one of these glass houses may throw all the stones he pleases in utter disregard of the old proverb. The bricks cost no more than those made of ordinary clay. Glass is a nonconductor and the lightning rod man will have to go out of business when glass houses become common. Some specimens of houses of this new building material are to be found in France. One writer grows enthusiastic over the soothing effect produced by the pale green light that came through his glass walls.

Spain's session to Germany of the twenty islands of the Ladrone group and the remark of the Queen Regent "It is useless for Spain to retain such minor appendages of our ancient empire" brings strongly to mind the extent of that empire. In the height of her power Spain ruled over Spain, The Netherlands, Austria and Portugal. Her King Charles was elected Emperor of Germany. Nearly all of South America, and much of North America was under the control of the Emperor. His successor Philip II. had for his crest a horse leaping at the sun with the motto "The earth is not sufficient." The tragic contrast of the Spain that was and the Spain that is, is scarcely paralleled in nations.

"Mr. Dooley" seems to have made the hit of the year with his shrewd comments on the world as it is. The Chicago reporter who began to air his sentiments through the words of the Roscommon Irishman has found his readers grow from those of the Chicago newspaper to the English speaking world. One great point in favor of Mr. Dooley is that his remarks are very quotable. Nothing more to the point in regard to the "goings on" in France has been written than Mr. Dooley's remark, "The Fr-rench are an onaisy and a thrubbled people." For the past year France has seemed to be on the borders of revolution. They take themselves so seriously that occasionally they force the rest of the world to attention in spite of its opinion that nothing really serious can come of the perpetual hysterics.

English as "she is spoke" in America seems to have a peculiar vitality. In spite of our mixed population drawn from every nation of the world and speaking all tongues and dialects, the per cent. of English speaking people is far in advance of all others. While many adults fail to learn the language of the country the second generation speak it as though it were their mother tongue. A large percentage of the native born inhabitants of the British Isles cannot speak English—the language of the nations for thousands of years. Over half a million Welshmen speak Welsh only and in the Highlands of Scotland nearly fifty thousand speak Gaelic. There are nearly forty thousand Irishmen who speak Erse, the native Irish tongue. In all, six languages are spoken by native born inhabitants of the British Isles. "United States" evidently has a power of growth greater than that of English as spoken in England.

One of the most significant remarks made at the Woman's Congress in London was the one that designated woman's clubs as a feature of a transectional stage in the woman question. The separations of the sexes and the theory that woman is to have a separate place in the world's effort will pass where woman has maintained her right to the equal position that she claims no reform or change of public sentiment was ever made without radical effort. Women have felt that they must alone make the struggle for equality; when it has been won more natural conditions will follow and "Woman's Congress" will be unknown. Women will quietly take their places at the general meetings of the professions they may follow—not because they are women but because they are lawyers, or doctors, professors or ministers, artists or journalists. When that day comes it will have been made possible through the efforts of pioneer women along these lines and it is these women who have made a great success of the London meeting of the International Congress of Women.

The different "Fresh air" societies in large cities are actively engaged in sending poor children for a week of pure air and wholesome food. The people of the rural districts have ably assisted in this thoughtful generosity for many years. Side by side with this effort for the brightening of life to thousands of poor people has grown and developed a system of out-door amusement in the cities. It was found that many children became lonesome at the separation from parents and familiar scenes and that this mental unrest prevented them from receiving the full measure of benefit. Plans have been matured by means of which children with their mothers are given a day's outing, returning home at night. In New York vast recreation piers have been built and opened to the public. Music is furnished and here the tired workers with their children may forget the cares of the day and breath fresh salt air that has not swept over a great city. The open air gymnasium is a feature that has been introduced but recently but which meets with most unqualified praise. Horizontal bars, rings and poles are provided and from the moment the gymnasium is opened until it closes there is an eager throng waiting for the individual turns at the apparatus. Many of these gymnasiums are supported by the city while some are maintained by private funds. They mean amusement and recreation but more than that they mean the development of a higher physical standard in the cities. There is an ethical side as well as a philanthropic one, for the sound body helps the sound mind and the sound mind means a decrease of crime. In hundreds of the public schools the playgrounds are thrown open at certain hours of the day and an instructor is provided whose duty is to teach the children how to play. Piles of sand are placed in the yards and the smaller children are allowed to play as they choose. The summer is growing to be the happiest time of the year to poor children in the cities that are taking an intelligent direction of summer schools, playgrounds, recreation piers and open air gymnasiums. Under their influence the slums are vanishing and "slum children" are being trained into intelligent citizens.

The public school system of America is a just course of pride to our citizens. The fact that these schools are absolutely free schools and that the opportunity for an education can be grasped by all is the corner stone of our idea of government. In spite of this fact the public school is often the subject of severe criticism. It is no doubt true that our methods might be improved in many ways. As a nation we can receive much benefit by a candid observation of some features of foreign schools. We claim that the school should fit for life and yet we have failed to recognize the part that technical training plays in the actual work-a-day world. We have trained the mind but left the hand totally unskilled. This we have striven to correct in late years by the introduction of mechanical drawing and manual training with its branches of cooking, dressmaking, wood carving and like subjects. Switzerland is far ahead of us in some respects for our sister republic provides six different grades of schools above the primary and many of these a professional housekeeping school. The pupils in one of the best of these schools at Geneva, number about two hundred. The ages are from twelve years up. Thirteen hours per week are given to the usual studies above the elementary grades but seventeen hours are demanded for the special technical work of the school. Geometry is taught with such a practical application as the drafting of a pattern for a dress sleeve. Cooking, washing and ironing, and chemistry as applied to foods are carefully studied. The children cook the dinners which they eat and they are given a week's dinners for the sum of forty cents. The bill of fare includes soup, meat and dessert. While we have included some features of this plan in our public school work we have but few cities where a school is devoted in the main to this training. It is safe to say that five-sevenths of the girls graduating from the High schools would find this practical training of more benefit as a preparation for life than the surface knowledge of mathematics and languages which they acquire under the name of culture. The part of a girl's training that includes a knowledge of cooking, sewing, etc., was once acquired at home. The mother was the teacher and the home was the school for this training. This is still true to a limited extent in many country homes. It died out first in the cities and it is there that manual training was first introduced in the schools. The country schools need this training in sewing at least. During the summer vacations schools are kept open in most of the large cities. Manual training is a very important part of the work. At the close of the session which is in August an exhibition of the work is made. The work in sewing done by these children is surprising. This practical turn to education will surely develop, although as yet we are far behind many foreign nations in this line.

MUSIC THAT PLEASES.

Readers of COMFORT who play the above piece will be pleased with the brilliancy of this two-step, which like many of those lately appearing as candidates for public favor is patriotic and military in its intention. Since Sousa introduced the swing and rhythm of these popular two-steps there have been a vast number of them given to the public but the above number is among the best. We are pleased to be able to give our readers such a fine example of this catching style of music, which is sure to be appreciated as soon as heard. One of the most gratifying events in the life of COMFORT has been the favor with which our monthly publication of good music has met in the estimation of our six millions of readers. It was with much hesitation that COMFORT originally undertook this music department, for uncertainty as to its desirability ever lurked in the editor's mind. However, all doubts were at once set to rest when trial was made and almost instant appreciation and commendation from our friends resulted.

It was but a step to another idea, the publication of sheet music at low prices. With high-class modern machinery COMFORT could not understand why sheet music could not be produced at a low rate the same as all other printed matter. The price of books, paper and materials had fallen nearly 400 per cent. in ten years and it hardly seemed possible that sheet music could not be published as cheaply as any other printed matter. This, with so many calls for more music, led us to look into the subject. We found the price of sheet music ranging from 40 cents to one dollar a piece and no intention of lower prices.

From that day we have labored incessantly to bring out the very best sheet music at a price so low as to astonish every buyer, and at the same time give the very best in workmanship, material and character. The public has appreciated this effort and nobly responded until we have been encouraged to present the long list of varied pieces which appear in our music offer in another column. COMFORT cannot fully tell how pleasant it is to receive the letters which delighted patrons have poured in showing their satisfaction over this music. We hope that every reader who has received benefit from this offer will send us a word of encouragement and praise; and, that each will remember to show some friend the music itself and our offer.

So rapidly has our method increased in popular favor that already there is a break of at least from 20 to 50 per cent. in the old monopoly prices in music. In department stores and hundreds of other places the brilliant example of COMFORT'S success in selling the best first-class sheet music at popular prices, has led to a wild cutting of prices and while none of them attempt to reach the low charge made by COMFORT'S musical offer, still none of them dare now to ask even the prices printed on their sheets. Such is the great revolution which has been brought about by the progressive spirit of one paper backed by the best and most modern machinery. The day of monopoly prices on sheet music has gone by and a gratified public may well thank COMFORT for the success of its enterprise.

ADELINA PATTI.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

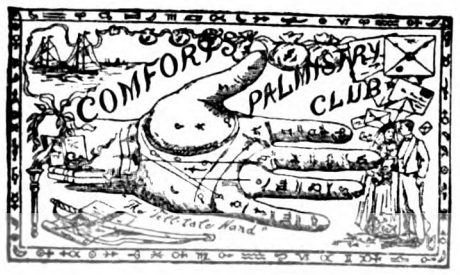
Among all the living artists no prima donna has the popularity or the love of musical people as Adelina Patti, and a few words about her and her daily life cannot help being of great interest to COMFORT'S readers.

This is especially true as Madame Patti has recently attracted world-wide attention by her marriage to Baron Cederstrom, a young man of twenty-eight, upon whom she has settled an annuity of $15,000 as "pin money."

Madame Adelina Maria Clorinda Patti-Nicolini, which is giving her full name, was born in Madrid in the year 1843 and on attaining age had become so marked for her musical power that she was given a full operatic training under Maurice Strakosch. In the meantime she had come to America and made her debut in New York in 1859 in the opera La Sonambula in which her success was so pronounced and instantaneous that she was immediately proclaimed one of the leading prima donnas of the age. It is safe to say that with the single exception of Jenny Lind, no prima donna who has ever visited America was received with the enthusiasm and popularity with which Patti was by the American public.

She was known then and has always been more or less called "the beautiful Spaniard," and the salaries which she obtained both in her first engagement and since have been such as to make both managers and professionals stand aghast, and have never been equaled by any other singer in this country. The most notable of her achievements was to obtain in 1870 from the late Czar, Alexander II., a medal and membership in the Russian Order of Merit, and an appointment as first singer in the Imperial Court. It is estimated that in her lifetime she has earned by her voice no less than $5,000,000 in our money, and no public singer has ever begun to equal the large figures which her earnings have attained at certain times. In one tour, in the year 1888, made in Argentina and Brazil, it is said she cleared between $300,000 and $350,000, receiving for twenty-four nights running as salary alone $8,000.

This great singer now lives in a castle in Wales called Craig-y-Nos and is noted the world over for the liberality and profuseness of her hospitality. It is said no person entertains more gracefully or with more real hospitality than she, and she is to all who know her a warm-hearted, affectionate and modest woman, whose character is above reproach. As an entertainer she has made it a rule not to interfere with her guests, but to leave them at perfect liberty to do as each may please, while at the same time her mind is ever busy arranging and furnishing some novel kind of entertainment.



The closest friend and adviser of Patti is Miss Caroline Burkmeister. She has full charge of the entire castle and not an entertainment is given, a servant hired or any event undertaken without her decision. Madame Patti places full reliance upon her and when a question is referred invariably directs the questioner to Caroline.

This lady is the life and soul of the entire castle, and has the keeping of the most valuable articles in her entire possession. Patti herself could not tell a visitor where her most valuable gems were kept, and although certain ones, such as the diamond given her by the Prince of Wales on the occasion of her marriage to Signor Nicolini, are kept in her own room the remainder of the great lot which are valued at over half a million dollars are safely placed within the depths of burglar proof safes and hidden in stone rooms. These are only accessible to Caroline herself.

It is said that it is only when this attendant decides that it is for Patti's advantage to change her jewels that any of these are taken out, when the whole lot of them are thoroughly overhauled and many of them are sent to London to be reset or placed in some modern appendage, while the remainder are returned to their safe keeping; and this care of the jewels also extends over Madame Patti's gowns and even to the selection of the same.

But the actual selection and arrangement of the toilet itself is left to a Mexican maid who is attached to Patti's person. She is an invaluable servant and has always been noted for her exquisite taste, and no person could bring

CONDUCTED BY DIGITUS.

I HAVE a number of questions to answer this month. First let me say to B. Hunt and to Mrs. J. J. R. of New Hampshire that their readings were used in the June number which I presume they have discovered before this time.

A new member of the Palmistry Club sends a list of questions which I answer here. He asks to have them answered in a self-addressed envelope by private letter but that, as I have often stated, I never do. I am willing to answer all reasonable questions in this department but I cannot undertake to write private letters to the members of this club.

What does it denote when the first joint of the thumb is extremely large and short in an otherwise fine hand? If the first joint is extremely large it means a good deal of combativeness and perseverance; it also shows a strong will, great promptitude in action, a reliable and steady judgment and great self-confidence. You will be impulsive, decided and enthusiastic but you will lack somewhat in logic and will be inclined to be obstinate. If this phalanx is excessively broad it shows ungovernable passions and sometimes brutal tendencies. If the second phalanx is thin and narrow in the center it shows great tact but if thick it shows a lack of that quality. With this broad first phalanx square fingers will offset the tendency to obstinacy and unreasonableness and will at least greatly modify them. On the whole it is a good quality unless carried to very great excess.

Where is the color shown of those who take part in my life, on the lines? which are blonde, which brunette? Lines showing interferences from other people? Lines running from the mount of the moon will show blonde; lines running from the mount of Saturn show dark people.

Where are the children or increase lines or indications? This I have answered many times. They are the fine lines which run on the side of the hand under the little fingers back of the mount of Mercury. It is not possible to tell accurately by these lines the sex of the children although some palmists have gone so far as to say that the deeply-indented ones are boys, the lighter ones girls. It seems to be generally accepted that the long ones indicate children who will live long and the short lines show short-lived children.

What do the wrinkles on the back of the second joint of the thumb denote? The wrinkles do not denote anything but if there is a well-defined star on the thumb it may indicate a misfortune coming from the other sex, an unhappy marriage or, if situated on the knuckle with a good development of the mount of Jupiter, it may mean a brilliant marriage. The ordinary wrinkles on the back of the hand do not enter into the reading of the palms.

What does a line from the mount of Venus to the base of the little finger denote, crossing fate, heart and tip of head line? If this line is connected with the marriage line so that the latter appears to be running down and across to the mount of Venus it indicates a divorce and if there is an island in this line it indicates a scandal connected with the divorce. If it is not connected with the marriage line and runs to the base of the little finger it means some strong influence that changes the whole career at the age indicated on the life and fate lines.

How may I be able to tell when certain events shown on the palm are to occur by the lines which foretell them? You should study the table indicating ages both on the fate line and life lines. Any event foreshown on these lines will occur at about the age indicated according to the table in the palmistry guide. It is not possible to tell to the exact month unless one is very expert but the time can be easily approximated.

AGGERO.

Several books larger than the little COMFORT GUIDE have been published and may be obtained at any first-class book store. Cheiro's book is to be had at Brentano's in New York City and Mr. Ed Heron Allen has published a very full treatise on palmistry which can be ordered through any good book store. We do not have any of these for sale. Another asks what it means to have the head line running far down into the mount of the moon and there crossed by a voyage line. It would mean a very romantic and melancholy temperament to begin with; a drooping head line always indicates that with casuistry and a vivid imagination. A voyage line if it is clear and uncrossed by other lines affecting that line might mean that a very important voyage was to be taken which must be guessed at by the position of this voyage line on the mount of Luna.

What does it mean to have the fate line rise from the center of the line of life, extend far into the head line and from there run into branches between Jupiter and Saturn? Starting from the line of life it indicates that the luck in life will arise from personal merit rather than from outside influences. It is always a good sign for the fate line to run up to the mount of Jupiter or onto it. It means a rich and fortunate marriage and is said to be an infallible sign. With a man it would mean that the subject was very ambitious and that he would realize his ambitions and meet with great success. It is in all cases an excellent sign bringing luck, distinction and wealth.

When the line of Apollo rises from the center of the wrist, goes straight through to the head line, then divides, one line stopping at the heart line under Saturn, the other going on through the mount of Apollo, what are the indications? This would be a splendid line showing that the luck would begin early in life and follow the subject straight through life. It indicates distinction and riches. If this person goes on the stage or before the public as a singer or speaker he would become very noted, successful and wealthy. The line of Apollo could not possibly be better. The branch dividing and stopping at the heart line under Saturn, however, would mean that some affair of the heart would come at the age indicated by its departure from the fate line and that possibly its results might not be pleasant to all concerned. The fact, however, that the main line goes straight on through the mount of Apollo indicates that no serious trouble would come to the person whose hand is marked in this way.

H. C. G. asks to have a reading sent to him at once. This, as I have before stated, I do not do, but neither do I find his hands among my list.

Aggero sends two well-marked hands denoting an ambitious character and good disposition. She has an artistic temperament and is fond of music, books and pictures. Her health will be fairly good although she is nervous and will have some weaknesses attendant upon that sort of temperament. She will be quite successful especially in early life. Her health will remain good until she is at least fifty, although a sickness indicated at between the ages of fifty and sixty is marked by a square and that proves that she will have protection from it. She has good luck rising from her line of life at many points and very little poor luck attends her. There will be some obstacles between twenty-five and forty that will probably be in the nature of interferences from other people with her affairs. She will not be able to do all she would like to perhaps because of obstacles placed in her way by well meaning friends. Her fate line indicates great success. Beginning at the wrist and going straight upward in the right hand, it shows that she will have good luck in most things that she undertakes. As I said before, she will meet with some obstacles but she has perseverance and strength enough to overcome them and go right on. She will not live to a very great age, that is after sixty-five or seventy but she will accomplish much and have a happy life. There are two or three love affairs in youth but I don't think she will marry until about thirty. She will then make a happy marriage though I think she will outlive her husband. There will be, however, several engagements first. She is attractive to the opposite sex and will always have much attention. She should be careful not to marry a jealous man as her life would be made very unhappy. I see only two children in her hand. I think she will marry a dark man who will be very good to her. She will see but little trouble although her nervous temperament will cause her to exaggerate much that will befall her inevitably in this vale of woe. I don't see any signs of great wealth although she will probably be comfortable especially during the latter part of her life. If she were to go into any business whereby to earn her way I should advise her to take up music or the stage. I don't think she would be a success as a teacher but she might as a stenographer or in some office calling. She will make many friends all her life and but few enemies. The last of her life she will travel a good deal but not in early life and I don't think she will ever live very far away from home. She will be liable to brain troubles and I see one serious illness at about the age of thirty or if she escapes that at about fifty-five, which will probably incur some danger of inflammation or congestion of the brain. She needs to guard against anything of that sort. On the whole, hers is a fortunate hand and indicates a reasonably happy and comfortable life.

AN IDEA FROM MOROCCO.

HERE is a description of a household contrivance in far-away Africa which, for convenience and skillfullness of design is worthy of competition with any Yankee device for the saving of labor.

In a Morocco hotel, whose stone walls are very thick, there is a long dining-room and a kitchen adjoining. Now, as the odors and sounds of the kitchen might fill the dining-room, should there be a connecting door between the two, this is omitted, and, to take its place, at least for the transference of dishes and food, there is a most ingenious device. This consists of a revolving cupboard or dumb waiter placed between the two rooms. The wall between them is about eighteen inches thick, and, by permitting the cupboard to project slightly into the room, a circle of two and a half or three feet high is secured. This is occupied by a revolving drum or cylinder four feet high and divided by two shelves. There is an opening down one side only. When this is towards the kitchen the closed side is presented to the dining-room, and as this is of polished mahogany it has a handsome appearance. After it is filled with dishes in the kitchen a touch of the finger whirls the drum about, and the waiter in the dining-room has only to take them out and serve their contents.

BRAZIL exports black diamonds to South Africa. These diamonds are not used as jewelry, but are used underground in the mines. South Africa does not produce them, but could not well get along without them. The black diamond is the hardest substance known; the rough stones are split by machinery into cubes and then welded into mining drills for boring. Black diamonds weigh less than 100 carats. An attempt to make these stones artificially has proven a failure; the cost is greater than the market price of the Brazilian diamond.

DEAR NIECES AND NEPHEWS:

The weeks and months roll around, fast or slowly according to the joys or sorrows, cares and perplexities, or pleasures and gayeties of each one of us, and once more it is August. Not, as last year, filled with the horrors and anxieties of war. Our dear ones are not, as then, huddled in fever stricken camps under a burning sun, with insufficient and tainted food, or performing guard duty under the same hard conditions, but are most of them once more quietly at home. Only in far away Manila are our soldiers, at the time this is written, still on active duty, and a letter from one of our boys there, even though it be six months old, will, I am sure, be most welcome to the cousins. Our soldier cousin writes as follows:

"I have just finished reading the letters from the cousins in the November number of COMFORT and thinking that it may interest them I will write a short sketch of ninety-three days spent on board a United States Transport.

"On the 3d of November, 1898, we started on our long journey of ten thousand miles from San Francisco to Manila. I will not attempt to describe the agonies of seasickness suffered by most of the thousand men on board during the first few days of the voyage.

"On the 12th of November we arrived at Honolulu, where we stopped four days to take on coal. We were allowed to spend the time on shore, and those four days in one of the finest cities in the world were enjoyed by all. The houses were overgrown with vines and shaded with tropical trees, and oranges, bananas, cocoanuts, etc., were growing everywhere.

"After leaving Honolulu we sailed west. The days were hot but the deck was covered with awnings and we were allowed to wear as little clothing as possible, and to take a cool shower bath twice a day, so we did not suffer from the heat.

"Our food was sufficient for us because we got no exercise, but it lacked in variety and quality and was seldom properly cooked. It was all cooked at the galley and a detail from each company got the allowance for their company in pans, and then the men lined up and each one was given his share and might eat it wherever he chose on the deck. It was all right when the sea was still, but when it was rough more food was scattered on the deck than was eaten. Those scenes will furnish the foundation for many a soldier's story when we get home. The days were all alike to us; one company detailed for guard duty and one for fatigue duty (to clean the deck), and a daily concert by the band was our routine. We arrived in Manila Bay December 7, and packed our clothes expecting to land, but were disappointed. Most of us went ashore on the 11th and the 20th, so we saw quite a good bit of Manila. We did not like it very well.

"On the 24th we got mail and Christmas presents from home. The 26th we sailed for Iloilo in company with two other transports and two gun boats. We anchored in the channel about a mile from the city. It was nice and cool there on account of the winds, and it rained every night. We stayed there until the 29th of January, expecting every day to get orders to land and capture the city which was held by natives.

"On the 29th we started back for Manila and dropped anchor about a mile from Cavite on January 31st. We have unloaded nearly all our supplies and expect to go ashore to stay to-morrow. We all are glad to get on shore once more after living for three months on the water. Strange to say, we have no serious sickness on board, and have not had one death. Anchored near us are five of Admiral Dewey's fleet, and an English gun boat and a few freight vessels. Near shore I can see the tops of three sunken Spanish gun boats. To the north, eight miles across the bay, lies Manila. Our regiment received twenty-three sacks of mail the day we arrived here.

"I have read COMFORT for nearly eight years and always found it well worth reading."

WM. ISAACSON, Co. C. 51st Iowa Vol.

Even were there no other good accomplished by our recent war with Spain we can rejoice that it has finished the process of reuniting the bonds so rudely severed in 1861, and that now there is no longer any "North" and "South," but from Puget Sound to Florida's southernmost cape, and from Cape Cod to Cape Mendocino we are a united nation, one and indivisible. To all the cousins, therefore, the following letter will be most welcome.

"There lingers around the city of Montgomery, the capital of Alabama, memories which will ever remain sacred to all Southerners; for it was there the first and last chapters of the Southern Confederacy were engraved on the hearts of gifted daughters and noble sons.

"On a high eminence, at the eastern terminus of Dexter Avenue, overlooking one of the most beautiful cities in the south, is situated an old-fashioned, but stately edifice where the laws of the State of Alabama are enacted to-day. Within the walls of this same old-fashioned, peaceful-looking structure, more than a quarter of a century ago, were enacted scenes, the results of which the pages of the nation's history have not recorded on them an equal.

"On the 4th day of February, 1861, delegates from seven southern states assembled within these walls and proceeded to organize the government of the Confederate States of America. A constitution was adopted and Jefferson Davis, of Mississippi, was chosen president and Alexander H. Stephens of Georgia, vice-president, and the seat of that government was temporarily located within the walls of the present State Capitol. Standing on the west porch of the capitol building with his face turned towards his native state, Jefferson Davis took the solemn oath of office as President of the Confederate States of America. The spot where he stood on that memorable occasion is to-day marked by a large brass star and is viewed by tourists from all climes.

"On the capitol grounds, less than a hundred yards from where Jefferson Davis stood when he took the oath of office, and just outside of the chamber where the first Confederate Congress was held, stands the representative of the last chapter of the Confederacy in the shape of a handsome monument whose summit towers up to the height of nearly one hundred feet.

ALABAMA STATE HOUSE AND CONFEDERATE MONUMENT.

"This monument is one of the most magnificent structures of the kind in the country and its erection was due to the untiring efforts of the ladies of Alabama. Its base is thirty-four feet square and consists of four blocks of stone, making as many steps. These steps lead up to four pedestals, on each of which stands a statue; an infantryman, an artilleryman, a cavalryman and a sailor. From this base rises a seventy foot circular shaft five feet in diameter. A circular base around the shaft represents marching troops. A Corinthian cap surmounts the whole, and upon this is a ten foot bronze statue representing a female figure typifying patriotism and the southern women. This figure holds in one hand a broken flag and with the other tenders to her sons a sword. The corner stone of the monument was laid by Jefferson Davis in 1886 and the monument was dedicated and formally presented to the State by the ladies of the Alabama Memorial Association on the eighth day of December, 1898.

"Thus the last chapter in the history of the Southern Confederacy was completed near the same spot where, nearly thirty-seven years before, the infant was born."

WILL W. NELSON, New Decatur, Ala.

To Naomi Kay, of De Graff, Ohio: Aunt Minerva cannot use stories of any kind.

Now for a peep at one of the beautiful bits of California scenery.

"Few of the very great throng who annually visit that most beautiful of all California spots, the Hotel Del Monte at the old city of Monterey, ever have seen or ever knew of the charming artificial lake situated among the velvety, rolling hills back of the old Spanish Capital. The lake was built some few years ago for the purpose of storing the abundance of water that flows through these undulating regions during the rainy season, and if there is ever a shortage of water during the long California summer the lake is resorted to for the use of the hotel.

"This alluring sheet of water lies in a low valley between softly sloping hills, covered with majestic pines and oaks, and where great ferns and tall wild flowers find a true home in the moist, leafy wold. The tops of the trees, unusually green here beneath the southern blue sky, have the appearance of rich green velvet, so thick and glossy are their masses of needles, while the wild ivy and clematis twine about the tree trunks, festoon themselves among the spreading branches and during the early spring months fill the soft air with sweetest fragrance. Among the trees occasional deer appear but at the faintest foreign sound spring in quick, light bounds through the high masses of ferns and low shrubbery and vanish within the depth of green.

"In the early morning or at the close of day the shadows of these bosky woods are reflected far across the smooth surface of the lake and add to its wild, alluring beauty. The lake then has the appearance of a glistening mirror painted by an artist capable of reproducing the most perfect of forest scenes. To a stranger the utter silence of this region is hard to be understood; so still is it that a twig snapped by a visitor sounds far across the wooded slopes and echoes in the occasional clearings. A fire kindled here of the fallen pines burns too with no sound other than that made by the flames for this wood neither snaps nor crackles.

"There is no road through the wooded uplands leading to this lake, just the narrow pathway winding through the trees and which is so little used that grass grows greenly over it. But the road which takes one to the starting of this pathway is the famous seventeen mile drive which leading on in the opposite direction from the lake path, carries one into a throng of fashionable people, glittering equipages and bewildering saddle horses; for here the social world which crowds upon the Del Monte takes its daily outing close upon the borders of the stilly woods with their tranquil and almost unvisited lake."

MAUD B. RODGERS, Menlo Park, California.

A. J. Nightingale, of Elyria, Kansas, must read the directions at the head of this department for the answer to his question.

Mrs. E. Snyder, of Slaght's, Colorado, will be perfectly correct if she sends subscriptions as she suggests.

The following letter seems particularly appropriate to this hot and dusty month.

"Some years ago I had the pleasure as well as the misfortune of traveling over southwestern Kansas. I say misfortune, because the time of which I write was during the most severe drought ever known to the settlers of that arid region. Crops of every kind were a total failure, and by mid-summer the vast prairies were sere and brown.

"One day in the latter part of July my course led me over a long stretch of desolate country, made all the more desolate, if possible, by an occasional claim 'soddy' from which all signs of life and hope had fled. At last, becoming tired of my lonely journey, and the hot southwest wind which had been beating upon my back for hours, I touched my horse lightly with the whip.

"It was now past four o'clock, and I was beginning to be a little concerned about a stopping place for the night. Suddenly my attention was caught by a strange and beautiful sight. Off a little to the left, extending in an easterly direction and reaching far into the dim distance lay a valley in which all vegetation appeared to be green and growing. I rode on and on, scarcely believing my eyes, so marvelous seemed such a landscape in the midst of all this devastation. At length I found myself at the head of the valley—a veritable paradise nestled amid scorched and treeless plains, which did not vanish at my approach, as I half feared it would. Soon after descending the gentle slope that led into the valley the welcome sound of falling water caused me to pause and look around. A few yards south of the road and in the inviting shadow of a clump of locust trees, I spied a flowing well and hastened to the cool retreat. The water poured from an iron pipe into a small reservoir, from whence it ran rippling away beneath a long row of beautiful trees by the road side. The water was as pure and refreshing as it looked, and my horse drank his fill and then reluctantly left the tender grass that grew along the little stream.

"My way from the well was through pleasant lanes on either side of which were rich fields and green meadows, also beautiful homes with orchards and vines clustered about them. Here and there were bits of woodland interspersed with miniature lakes. Not far from one of these lakes, at a pretty cottage, I stopped and was met with hospitality of the true Southern type. I spent the next day in Artesian Valley and found the inhabitants generally as delightful as their abiding place. This valley is situated in the northeastern part of Meade Co., Kansas. It contains a score or more fine, fertile farms and is chiefly watered by artesian wells, from which it takes its name."

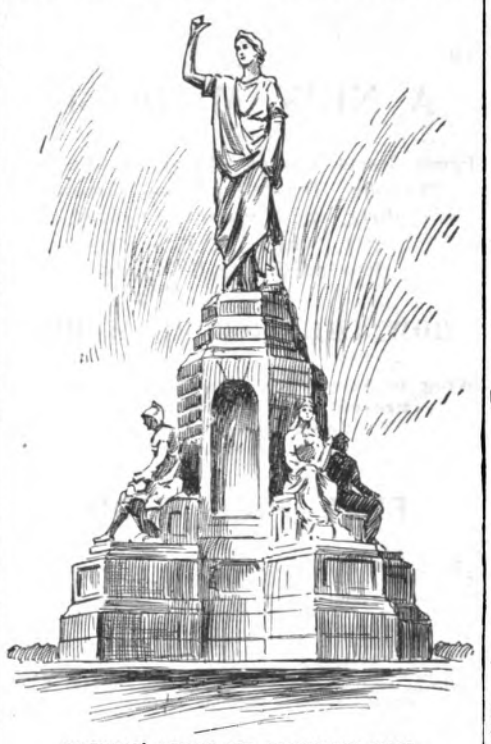
H. BOWEN, Arkansas City, Kansas.

The next letter contains another interesting bit of Cuban War history which I am sure my readers will welcome.

"Montgomery County in southwestern Iowa, received its name in honor of General Richard Montgomery of Revolutionary fame, who fell in the assault on Quebec, December 31, 1775. Red Oak is its county seat. Red Oak got its name from the fact that a part of the town plat was at one time covered with a growth of the red oak. This city is noted for its many beautiful and costly residences. Its moral atmosphere is of the best, no saloon having existed in its borders, or even in its county for years. Red Oak is a picturesque place as it nestles on the hillside and on the bottom of the Nishnabotna river. It is said the Indians named it Nishnabotna, meaning it was so large a stream it had to be crossed in a canoe.

"Red Oak was the birthplace and the home of the loved Lieut. Darwin Merritt, who lost his life on the ill-fated Maine, and whose body has never been recovered from its watery grave in Havana Harbor. Had it not been for his kind disposition he might have saved himself, but he stopped to lend a helping hand to a fellow soldier, thereby saving him but losing his own life. Red Oak truly mourned his death and many a soldier went forth to avenge it. Among the rest two of Darwin's brothers, who are now at Manila. Lieut. Merritt's mother passed to the other shore many years ago, but his father, the Rev. W. W. Merritt, still lives at Red Oak. Lieut. Merritt was educated at the United States Naval School, where he graduated with high honors. He was loved and respected by all and to be his friend was indeed an honor."

ISADOR CLARK, Elliot, Iowa.



Oh, dear, dear! Why will my nephews and nieces persist in sending me articles which I cannot use! I hate to refuse them, you know I do, but I cannot use poems or stories or compiled articles, and here this month are two stories, three poems, and two compiled articles, all of which I must throw in the waste basket. Now if these same people would only send me a description and a picture of the old French Market in New Orleans (if they have been there) or of the work of a cotton or wool mill, or of the building or launching of a ship which they have witnessed, or of the making of a coffee pot, even, if they have some knowledge of the process, I would be so glad to get them.

This next letter, for instance, is just what I want, for this cousin has been in Plymouth, and knows of what she writes.

"DEAR AUNT MINERVA:

"Some time since one of the cousins wrote you a letter about Plymouth. While many things of interest were described in that letter, many others were omitted, and I would like to have the cousins who live at too great a distance to visit this lovely town of such great historic interest to every American, know of some of the other points of interest.

"In addition to being situated on a large bay of the ocean, it has fresh water facilities, having no less than three hundred and sixty-five ponds, some large enough to be called lakes. Pilgrim Hall is dedicated to the Pilgrims and has a fine collection of antiques in the shape of old furniture, oil paintings, shoes worn by Governor Bradford when a child, and a carved armchair of his. The Pilgrim Monument is one of the handsomest monuments in America. It stands upon an eminence in Monument Park, a tract of nine acres of land. It was presented by Oliver Ames, of Easton, Mass., and cost $30,000. The pedestal has four wings on which are figures representing Morality, Law, Freedom and Education, and above these is the statue of Faith, thirty-six feet in height, or six times life size. This is the greatest granite figure in the world. The whole height of the monument is eighty-one feet. It was completed and dedicated in 1889, and commemorates the Pilgrims and bears the following inscription: 'National monument to the forefathers, erected by a grateful people in remembrance of their labors, sacrifices and sufferings for the cause of civil and religious liberty.'"

GERTRUDE CROCKETT, Plymouth, Mass.

Our next letter was written by a page in the Texas Legislature, so we may be sure that he knows whereof he speaks when his subject is the Texas State House. He says:

"As I am a page in the twenty-sixth Legislature of Texas and a reader of COMFORT I take the liberty of sending you the following description of our beautiful State House.

"The Texas State House is the largest Capitol in the United States with the exception of the National Capitol in Washington, D. C. It is built of stone and granite, its exterior walls being of red granite. In shape it is a Greek cross, having a rotunda and dome at the intersection of the arms of the cross. It measures five hundred and sixty-five feet in length by two hundred and eighty-seven in width. Its height to the apex of the dome is three hundred and thirteen feet, being six feet higher than the dome of the National Capitol. It cost the State three million acres of land and $650,000.

"The massive building is heated by steam and lighted by electricity, for the production of which it has a special plant, owned and operated by the State. Its eight hundred lights are very artistically arranged, some in the form of stars—emblem of the State—and others form the word Texas. Beautiful paintings adorn the interior walls of the building, and fountains of water supplied by an artesian well are scattered here and there in convenient spots.

"The present Legislative body is composed of young men, seventy-five per cent. of whom are under thirty-three years of age."

ALBERT C. ADAMS, Austin, Texas.

Now we must end our session, and when we meet again in September vacations will be over and the serious business of life will again demand our attention. Till then farewell.

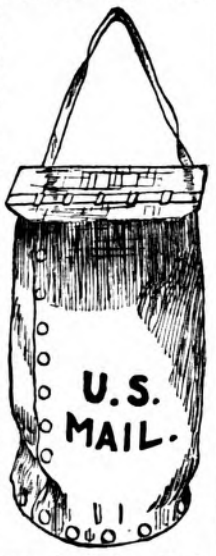
WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.



THE United States mail bag, here illustrated, is, as nearly as possible, a fac simile of the mail bag used by Uncle Sam—and is intended to be hung from a woman's writing desk, to hold letters that have not been answered. It is made of tan colored canvas, and the circular bottom piece measures four inches across. The bag part is cut wide enough to fit tightly around this circular piece, and is eight inches long. It is fastened together up the side in front, and also to the circular bottom, by means of brass split tacks. A cover is made of the canvas over a piece of pasteboard, which measures five by three inches. A narrow satin ribbon is attached to the back of the bag just below where the cover is attached, for hanging it up.

Nothing gives a more attractive touch to a bedroom than pretty pieces of handiwork. The dressing table is especially adapted to the display of such work, and a well equipped dressing table gives a distinctive touch to the entire room.

Glove and handkerchief boxes are not only a great convenience, but as now made they are very ornamental. A very dainty box may be made from satin ribbon and linen, using any color of ribbon that harmonizes with the room. To fashion the handkerchief box cut five pieces of cardboard, one six inches square, the other four each three by six inches. Cover one side of each piece with white linen and the other side with white quilted satin. Baste these covers firmly in place and then bind each piece with satin ribbon of the chosen color, letting it lap equally upon both sides. The square piece forms the bottom of the box and the four oblong pieces the cover. For the side, which is only a satin puff, take one and one-half yards of satin ribbon of the same shade as the binding, and four inches in width, gather both edges and join the ends in a neat seam. Divide the ribbon into four equal lengths or sections so the fullness shall be equal on all sides, and then overhand one edge of the ribbon to the square piece of covered cardboard. Overhand each section of the upper edge to one of the oblong pieces already covered, sewing to one of the long edges. These form the cover, and box is closed by folding over two opposite sections and then the two remaining sections. Fasten a ribbon like that used for binding upon two opposite sides where the wide ribbon is sewed to the cardboard, a full bow with several loops and ends on one ribbon, and fasten the end of the opposite ribbon beneath the bow by means of a hook and eye. This saves untying the bow each time and consequently keeps it fresh much longer. If you wish to have your box especially pretty, embroider two of the oblong linen covers in the shades of Asiatic filo harmonizing with the color of the ribbon before putting them on the cardboard. The design may be very simple, a small spray of flowers, or a dainty conventional pattern. These embroidered pieces are of course to be folded over last, forming the top of the cover. If you choose, satchet powder may be placed beneath the quilted satin lining of the box, and a thin layer of white cotton wadding placed upon both sides of the cardboard before the linen and satin covers are put on improves the appearance, giving a softer effect.

The glove box is made in the same fashion, but is made six by twelve inches in size. This is the dimension for the bottom cardboard; two of the top pieces will be three by twelve inches, the other two will be six inches square. The long narrow sections should form the outer lids, and the ribbon for fastening will be placed in the middle of the long sides.

These boxes when finished are very dainty indeed, and afford protection from dust while keeping the articles in much better order than can be done in a drawer where there is more danger of mussing from contact with other belongings.

The newest pincushions are made long and narrow, and are stuffed very full. We illustrated one of these long cushions, recently. The edge is finished with a full ruffle or with a cord. The handsomest of these are covered with white satin embroidered in delicate shades of Asiatic filo and the edge has a double ruffle, the under one of silk with the edges pinked, and of the color used in the embroidery of the cover, and the upper ruffle of a filmy lace. Most of these cushions are cut five inches wide and from fourteen to eighteen inches long. The eighteen inch length is extreme, however. Another cover which is liked very much is of sheer linen embroidered, and put on over a delicate color. This same color is then used for the under ruffle, and the upper ruffle is made of the linen hemstitched or featherstitched.

When a less elaborate cushion is wanted the same shaped foundation may be used and covered plain with a color. A shaped linen cover may be embroidered, having pointed ends, and lace may be gathered simply across these ends of the linen, with a cord finish where the under and upper sections of the cushion cover join. Sometimes the lace is put across one end of the linen cover only, and a bow of ribbon is secured at the other end. Any dainty pretty style of finish may be chosen to suit the fancy, and to conform to the new shape.

Round cushions are also pretty, and these may be finished with a full ruffle where the seams join. Such cushions if stuffed full set up high, and the lower edge of ruffle should just reach the dresser and thus cover the lower half of the cushion. The top may be finished with embroidery or with a tiny lace cover. If one makes Battenburg lace then that can be used with good effect.

The round cushion here illustrated measures three inches across, and is made of pink silk, with a row of pink and green rosettes around the edge. This cushion is intended to be hung from the side of the mirror, where it is a great convenience, particularly on a gentleman's chiffonier, being out of the way, and yet just where it is the most handy.

A square cushion foundation may be quite altered in appearance by finishing with a double ruffle which is brought from the middle of one side, up over the corner to the middle of the next side, and so on. This makes a very pretty shape. The covers most favored for any shaped cushion are satin or linen embroidered, or lace.

The lattice-work jacket has come to stay—for it is so pretty and such a convenience that it will not quickly run itself out. The one here shown is taken from one made of white muslin, barred off with narrow black velvet ribbon. When the bright young woman who built it is through with it in connection with the white muslin gown with which she wears it this summer, she intends to cut out all the muslin between the velvet strips and so leave it simply an open-work jacket, of velvet, to be worn over fancy silk waists of light colors, during the winter. Thus if she has two or three perfectly plain china silk waists, in pink, blue and lavender, she can wear this little jacket over them all, and so have quite a variety—though care should be used not to appear too often in it, or where she is likely to meet the same people.

A NEW MICROBE.

From Paris Comes Word of the New Microbe Discovered by Doctor Fahrig, the Eminent Bacteriologist, which, it Has Been Proved, Causes Baldness.

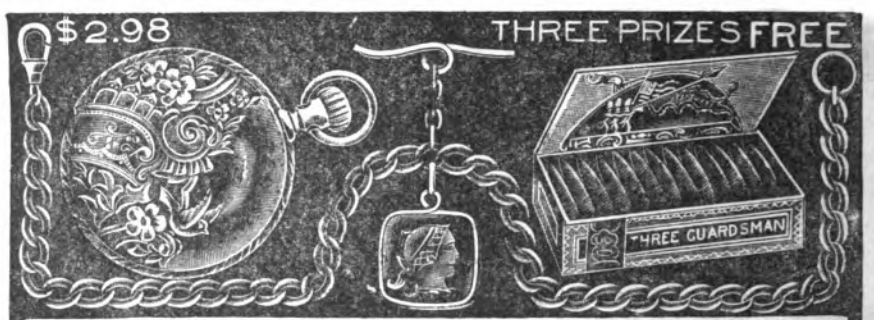
HOW THE MICROBE WORKS

What is Needed to Stop Its Ravages and Prevent Our Descendants from Being a Race of Bald Heads.

FREE HAIR FOOD.

Dr. E. Fahrig, the eminent professor of chemistry and doctor of science of Paris, has made public the nature of his latest discoveries in regard to fibre, human hair and the microbe which causes dandruff, falling hair, gray hair and baldness.

His discovery will revolutionize the treatment of all hair diseases.



In his treatise lately published he describes his experiments as to the contagious properties of dandruff, as caused by the transferring of the microbe from one person to another, and also explains how the microbe can be destroyed by proper germicidal and microbicidal applications.

This treatment, as Dr. Fahrig makes clear, by destroying the microbe also cures the disease of which it is the cause and therefore gives permanent relief from dandruff and falling hair, and prevents premature gray hair and baldness even up to extreme old age.

Those of our readers who wish to test it should send their name and address at once to the Cranitonic Hair Food Co., 526 West Broadway, New York City, mentioning COMFORT, when a free bottle will be sent them direct by mail prepaid. ADELINA PATTI.

out Patti's beauty better than she. Patti is very fond of the toilet and it is an elaborate affair, for she daily retires from observation about five and until half-past six cannot be seen even by her most intimate friends. It is during this seclusion that her toilet is made, and the greater part is devoted to the arrangement of her hair which has always been her crowning beauty. Every person who has seen Patti remembers the irresistible attraction of her oval face and the arrangement of the tendrils of hair on the cheek and forehead. This Mexican maid spends hours with brush and comb arranging the hair, but the final touches are by Patti's own fingers and those picturesque little curls are of her own twining.

There is no doubt that the most elaborate and complete collection of stage costumes owned by any one person in the world is at this castle. Patti has never given away or sold a single one of the many costumes in which she has appeared in public and these with their appropriate belongings, or as the theatrical people would say properties, are kept in order and packed in chests and wardrobes in her home. Each costume is complete in itself and has every article, with the exception of the jewels, which appeared with it when the performance in which it was a part took place.

She is an excellent correspondent, receiving many letters each day and on all subjects. Stage-struck girls, impecunious widows, young children, and even elderly men constantly write to her asking advice or other attentions; while many people flood her with begging letters of all descriptions. To everything possible she returns a good-humored reply never showing any disturbance or unkindness, no matter what the request may be. Strange as it may seem, after the many years of public life that she has lead, Madame Patti is still a victim of stage fright and declares that the sight of advertisements containing her name makes her nervous and depressed and lacking in confidence, a feeling which even her greatest successes have never entirely eradicated from her mind.

Fifty carrier pigeon stations have been established in the Hawaiian Islands for the rapid conveyance of letters.

Useful Ornaments are sought after at all seasons of the year. People do not realize the quantities of goods that are sold through the mails. Inventors are daily trying to get up something to sell by mail that will be pretty, useful, and cheap. A pretty foot-rest could never be obtained at a low price before (they sell for $1.00 each at the stores), but by getting up something that is turned out by machines in pretty colored durable goods, to be filled with cotton or any cheap or cast-off substance and then sewn up, we can now give a premium that will be welcome in every room in all the homes from Maine to California. It comes in the shape of a handsome Spaniel Bow-Wow, lying down, size about 8x12 inches, and can always be placed for an ornament when not in use by grandma or yourself or company as a Foot Rest. It will create untold merriment when lying in front of the fire, it is so life-like in shape and color. Although entirely new, 57,398 have already been sold, and millions more will be in use before many months. Agents will find them great sellers, and should order at least a dozen to start with.

BIG OFFER. We will send a sample postpaid to anyone sending 13c., for a three months' subscription to this paper. Two Rests and this paper 6 months for 25c.; five for 50c.; one dozen, $1.00; one Rest and 10c. lot Remnants 20c.; one Rest and 25c. lot of Remnants, 25c.

CONDUCTED BY AUNT SARAH.

THE stocking of the preserve closet is the special work of the prudent housewife, at this season, and this isn't such a task as it sounds, as the berries come in turn, so that usually one may do her strawberries, then her raspberries, then her currants and other berries and by this time it is the season for plums, peaches, pears and jellies. Then come the pickles. Really, nature has made it very easy for us, in stringing things along and so allowing us to get one thing well out of the way before entering upon the next.

Perhaps it would be as well to give a good, reliable recipe for preserving these various fruits—even though we have given some of the recipes before in these columns—for new readers must be thought of, also the carelessness of old ones, who forget to save the recipes from back numbers.

STRAWBERRY PRESERVES.

Pick over, wash, drain and hull strawberries; then weigh. Fill jars with berries. Make a syrup by boiling three-fourths the weight of the berries in sugar, allowing a cup of water to each pound of sugar. As soon as syrup reaches boiling point, skim, and add it to the berries in the jars, so that the jars overflow; let stand fifteen minutes when fruit will have shrunk, and more must be added to fill the jars. Screw on covers, put in a kettle of cold water, heat to the boiling point and keep just below boiling one hour.

RASPBERRY PRESERVES.

Raspberries may be preserved in the same way as strawberries—or, if a thin juice instead of a syrup is desired, simply fill the jars with alternate layers of berries and sugar—let stand in cold water on the stove until water has reached boiling point; then fill jars with boiling water (for the fruit has shrunk and the sugar melted) and screw on tops. The next day have some one who is strong go over all the jars and screw tops on as securely as possible.

GIVING POINTS TO A FRIEND.

SPICED CURRANTS.

Pick over seven pounds currants, wash, drain and remove stems. Put in a preserving kettle, add five pounds brown sugar and one pint vinegar. Into a muslin bag, loosely, allowing plenty of room, put three tablespoons cinnamon and the same amount of ground cloves. Heat to the boiling point and then let cook slowly an hour and a half. Put up in preserving jars.

SWEET PICKLED PEACHES.

Boil two pounds brown sugar, one pint vinegar and one ounce stick cinnamon twenty minutes. Dip one-half peck peaches, individually, into hot water and rub off the fur with a towel. Stick each peach with four cloves. Put into the syrup and boil until soft, using one-half the peaches at a time.

Pears may be pickled in the same way as above.

To preserve Damson plums, follow recipe given for strawberries, for the syrup. Add the plums, which have previously been wiped and each plum pricked three or four times with a large needle. Cook until soft. It is well to use two kettles, and to divide the syrup and plums and so not only accelerate the work, but also keep the plums in good shape by not crowding them into one kettle.

CANNED HUCKLEBERRIES.

Pick over and wash the berries and then put in a preserving kettle with a small quantity of water. Cook until berries are soft, and then put into jars. No sugar is required, but a sprinkling of salt is an addition.

TUTTI FRUITTI.

Put one pint of brandy into a stone jar and add the various fruits as they come along; to each quart of fruit add the same quantity of sugar, and stir the mixture each morning until all the fruit has been added. Raspberries, strawberries, peaches, cherries and pineapples are the best to use. This mixture is supposed to be used for punch—being added to an ordinary lemonade—when it gives the exquisite flavor of all these fruits combined.

GRAPE WINE.

To each gallon of grapes, allow one gallon of water; bruise the grapes in the water and let them stand for a week without stirring, then draw off and strain. To each gallon of liquid add three pounds of sugar and pour all into a cask; leave cask open until wine has done hissing—then seal up.

ELDERBLOW WINE.

Use only the blows for this, and there should be a quart measure full, packed down solid. Into a five gallon crock put nine pounds of granulated sugar, and pour over it three gallons boiling water. Add the blows, and when cool add one yeast cake which has previously been dissolved in a little lukewarm water. Cover the crock and each day for a week stir the mixture. At the end of that time, strain, add three pounds of raisins which have been washed and snipped with scissors and then put crock in the cellar to stand for six weeks—being stirred once a week, meanwhile. At the end of the six weeks, strain again, add one pint best whiskey and bottle—putting one raisin into each bottle.

CHILI SAUCE.

Peel twelve medium sized ripe tomatoes and slice. Put in a preserving kettle with one pepper finely chopped, one onion ditto, two cups vinegar, three tablespoons sugar, one tablespoon salt, two teaspoons clove, the same of cinnamon, allspice and grated nutmeg. Heat gradually to boiling point and cook slowly for two and one-half hours.

UNRIPE CUCUMBER PICKLES.

Wipe four quarts small cucumbers. Put in a stone jar and add one cup salt dissolved in two quarts boiling water and let stand three days. Drain cucumbers from brine, heat brine to boiling point, pour over cucumbers and again let stand three days; repeat. Drain, wipe cucumbers, and pour over one gallon boiling water in which one tablespoon alum has been dissolved. Let stand six hours, then drain from alum water. Cook cucumbers ten minutes, a few at a time, in one-fourth the following mixture heated to the boiling point and boiled ten minutes: one gallon vinegar, four red peppers, two sticks cinnamon, two tablespoons allspice berries and two tablespoons cloves. Strain remaining liquor over pickles which have been put in a stone jar.

RIPE CUCUMBER PICKLES.

Cut cucumbers in halves lengthwise, and then into smaller pieces if the cucumbers are of largo size. Cover with alum water, allowing two teaspoons powdered alum to each quart of water. Heat gradually to boiling point, then let stand on back of range two hours. Remove from alum water and chill in ice water. Make a syrup by boiling five minutes two pounds of sugar, one pint vinegar and two tablespoons each of whole cloves and stick cinnamon tied in a piece of muslin. Add cucumbers and cook ten minutes. Remove cucumbers to a stone jar and pour over syrup. Scald syrup three successive mornings and return to cucumbers.

The odors of plants exist in different parts of them—sometimes in the wood, as in the cedar and sandal wood; sometimes in the leaves as in patchouly and thyme; and in the seeds as in caraway; in the roots as in orris, and in the bark, as in cinnamon. The orange has three odors—the flowers, the leaves and the rind.

His master thinks he is the wisest and best cat in town, and he has spared no expense in giving "Tom Majors" everything he wanted. He is very fond of turkey, and has had it at all seasons, no matter how expensive it is.

AN English invention known as a water cycle has a feature that belongs entirely to itself. This is a propeller which is an exact copy of the Indian canoe paddle. It is fastened to the water cycle in such a manner that it can be driven at high speed by foot power applied to pedals as in the bicycle. The boat is made for two persons, and can be driven in smooth water at the rate of twelve miles an hour, easily.

HUMANITY'S BENEFACTOR.

Thousands Who Were Afflicted Raise Their Voice in Gratitude to this Wonderful Man.

Prof. Weltmer, of Nevada, Mo., is doing more for the afflicted than any man known to history. He is the direct cause for placing Magnetic Healing on a scientific basis, it is conceded that his physological explanations are the only logical ones, scientists therefore term his method Weltmerism. His absent treatment, which dispels all disease at a distance just as readily as those brought to Nevada, has effected such marvelous cures that some claim it to be supernatural, others that there must be a divine force existing in the Professor, different from others. From the mere fact that Prof. Weltmer teaches his wonderful art to others, and his students are just as efficient as himself, disproves this belief. Hon. Press Irons, Mayor of Nevada, was afflicted with kidney and bladder troubles for ten years and could find no relief in the usual remedies. In one week he was completely restored by Prof. Weltmer. Mrs. Jennie L. Linch, Lakeview, Mo., was for two years afflicted with ulceration of the womb, heart and stomach troubles. In less than 30 days she was cured by the Absent Method. Mrs. M. M. Walker, Poca, W. Va., suffered severely with female trouble and eczema, and was entirely restored by Prof. Weltmer in a month without ever seeing her. In like manner thousands have been restored. Lost vitality and kindred ailments positively cured. By writing Prof. S. A. Weltmer, Nevada, Mo., you will receive free the Magnetic Journal, a 40-page illustrated magazine, and a long list of the most remarkable cures ever performed.

PROF. WELTMER.

TEACHES HIS ART TO OTHERS. Prof. Weltmer teaches his wonderful art to others, and it is the grandest and best paying profession of the age. Many of his students are making $10.00 to $50.00 per day. Taught by mail or personal instructions. For full instructions write to The American School of Magnetic Healing, Nevada, Mo.

TALKS WITH GIRLS.

COUSIN MARION.

Here is a warm greeting to you all, my dears, but I feel sure that you would rather I treated you coldly, at least, until after the summer sun has set. I hope you have come comfortably through half of the summer and that August and its "dog days" won't have any bad effect upon you. At first I was going off for a vacation, but I think I would prefer to stay and talk to my cousins, so here I am talking as usual.

The first in the list is from Anxious Inquirer of Des Moines, Ia., who has been reading Mrs. Julia McNair's book on the home and wants something more recent. Evidently this cousin is contemplating matrimony, and if she will write to the publishers of the book they will no doubt tell her where she may learn all about how to make her nest the prettiest.

Triplets, North Loup, Neb.—A man should not put his arm around a girl until or unless he is engaged to her. I think I have said this a thousand times.

M. M. K., Steel, Ohio.—Cousin Marion's address is care of COMFORT, Augusta, Me., and she does not answer letters personally unless there are imperative reasons why she should.

Mabel, Indianola, Ia., who is fifteen years old asks me several questions about beaus and she spells her own name, Mable. Dear, dear, it isn't beaus you need so much as a spelling book.

Anet, Portland, Ore.—It isn't the young man's fault that his parentage is clouded, and if you love him, marry him. That is the sentimental side of your question. On the practical, every day, living side, it is hardly fair to the children who may come of such a marriage. (2) It will be quite right to send the excursion ticket to your fourth cousin. (3) Astrologers don't know any more about your future than you do. (4) A girl of sixteen or seventeen may wear her hair down if she is small and girlish looking.

Josephine, Natchitoches, La.—A good rule in the marriage question is: When in doubt, don't. Wait for the one you love if he wants you to.

Bashful Fifteen, Dorchester, Ia.—There is no cure for bashfulness except time and a constant effort to think about something else except yourself. (2) Don't use glycerine or anything else on your eyes until you have asked your druggist or physician about it. (3) Proper care in eating and drinking will reduce and may remove redness of the nose. However, it is a disease in some cases, and requires the direction of a physician. Consult one.

Geraldine, Little Sandusky, Ohio.—It is courteous for both the lady and gentleman to thank each other in a friendly way for ordinary social attentions.

Carmen, Trenton, N. J.—The young man, who comes to see you once in several weeks, says he is going to marry you and goes to see other girls, is so very thin a fraud that a girl of ordinary judgment ought to see through him at once. Drop him. The other young man who has been calling for a year and says nothing about love or marriage isn't thinking about you in that connection, and you should not think of him so. If he wants you he will make signs enough.

Blue Bell, Melrose, Minn.—A girl of seventeen may have as a friend a man of twenty-five and accept courtesies from him and she may give him flowers from her garden, but why should there be any kissing? It depends upon your acquaintance and relations to each other whether or not you should be Mr. and Miss to each other.

Daisy Belle, Lakewood, N. J.—Girls of fifteen should think about something more necessary to their future usefulness as women than beaus.

Miss D., Toronto, Can.—My dear, how can I tell you what the young man thinks of you if he doesn't tell you himself? Ask him. (2) It is the custom for young women who meet men in a business way to speak to them outside of their business places when the acquaintance has continued for sometime. Do not presume however, upon an office acquaintance to speak to a man outside, until you are sure it will be agreeable. Some men are very silly.

Dell, Rosewell, N. M.—The young man should simply ask the lady if he can accompany her home from church. That's all there is to be said. (2) A note asking the same favor, to or from, should be written as if the question were being asked. It is too simple to give a set form for.

Violet, Glasgow, Mo.—Young people wear each other's rings and I suppose there is no harm in it. It is a matter of taste. (2) Let the man take his own hat in church. (3) Four leaf clover is good luck. Where have you been that you hadn't learned this before? (4) Two young men may call on a girl in the afternoon. The more, the merrier. (5) No.

Lily Dale, Dayton, Ohio.—The flesh on the body can not be reduced leaving the face plump.

Idle Girl, Evart, Texas.—The man is indifferent and does not care a rap of his finger for you, and if you are sensible you will forget him. You ought to know that he is fooling you.

A. W., New Hartford, Ia.—If you do not care to marry it is very well not to have a "steady fellow." Otherwise you had better settle down to one, or permit him to settle down to you.

Callie, Malvern, Ark.—Don't run away and get married in the Court House by a Justice of the Peace. Get married at home by the preacher.

Betta, Guthrie, Oklahoma.—Wait five years for the young man who "blushes and smiles so sweet" and by that time you will be old enough to know what to do, and possibly how much you are loving quite a different fellow.

Purple Violet, Mayfield, Cal.—It is quite right for you to wear a corset and if you select the proper shape it will improve your figure and remove the annoyance you mention.

Grover, Klondike, Ia.—Early engagements are not advisable. A woman should not marry before she is twenty-five, and a man should be at least thirty. (2) Do not write to the young man and forget him.

Penelapia Folsom is an Indian cousin fourteen years old, living in the Indian Territory who wants some of the cousins to write to her, but I do not think it advisable that the cousins have their real names published as there is danger in it.

White Lily, Mendon, Kans.—Having ceased to care for the young man and having a good reason, tell him so and cut short further associations. (2) It isn't love at all that prompts a man to act as you say. (3) Some men quit drinking when they promise to, and some do not. You run a great risk in marrying a man who drinks.

Violet, New York City.—The man should write first unless the lady writes to give him her address as by previous arrangement. (2) People are introduced to each other in public conveyances, even in New York, but it is not very elegant.

Kate, Stephensville, Miss.—Don't marry any one of the five. Take somebody you love.

Sorrow, Lindsey, Kan.—Don't marry the rich but irreverent young man whom you do not want to marry and whom you abominate. There is no law in Kansas compelling you to. You'd a thousand times better earn your own living.

Ethelyn of El Dorado, Kan., and Ignorance of Woodsworth, Md., are two more cousins who are suffering from indifferent young men. Girls, girls, girls, won't you ever learn that you must throw that kind over and throw them hard? Why in the name of common sense do you want to waste your brains or hearts on the men who only laugh at you? If you can't help it, you have my sincerest sympathy.

Now all your questions are answered, either directly or to some other cousin asking the same questions, and I must say by by till September and wish you good luck while I run away for a minute's vacation.

COUSIN MARION.

AN AWFUL SUFFERER.

If there is any disease which is awful in its effects upon the sufferer, that disease is Asthma. Suffocating, gasping for air, and sitting up, perhaps for weeks, in an agony of despair, weary, worn and helpless, such is the life of one who is afflicted with Asthma. An explorer on the Congo River in Darkest Africa, recently discovered the wonderful Kola Plant, which has proved an unfailing cure for Asthma, Hay-fever and allied spasmodic diseases. And now all over Europe physicians are endorsing and prescribing the Kola Plant as the only sure constitutional cure for these diseases. There are seven thousand recorded cures within three months. So sure are the importers of Kola of the fact that it cannot fail to cure, that they are sending out large trial cases free, to any sufferer from Asthma or Hay-fever who makes the request. For the benefit of our readers who may be afflicted, we cheerfully give the address of the Importing Company, who have given this boon to humanity. Address Kola Importing Co., 1162 Broadway, New York, and they will send you a Large Trial Case free, by mail, and prepaid. It costs you nothing and you should surely try it.

CONDUCTED BY REGULUS.

WHEN the Sun arrives at the first minute of the celestial sign Libra the Autumn quarter commences; and in the figure erected for that time the 6th degree of Leo is on the eastern horizon while the 25th degree of Aries is on the south meridian, overhead. Leo ascending gives the Sun as chief significator or ruler of the figure. The moon will be in the midheaven in benevolent aspect with Mercury in the 3rd house where also the Sun and Venus are located. Mars is moving into conjunction with Jupiter, both in the 4th house; while the two great malefics Saturn and Herschel are in the 5th house.

Altogether the figure for the quarter is a very favorable one for the general peace and prosperity of the nation. The Moon and Mercury dignified and in benefic aspect, promises unusual travel and marked improvement in railway traffic and in all the commercial lines. Railways will be favored and postal service will be effective and satisfactory. The agricultural community will be prospered, there being an abundance of corn or at least good prices for same to the farmers. True, Mars is in the 4th and may show some harm from drought or violent or other unusual disturbances of the atmosphere. The fall is likely to show some unusually dry spells which are harmful to yield of farm products in sections.

The malefics in the 5th do not promise so favorably for the Nation's sports and there are to be encountered some bad accidents or some disease affecting horses, particularly of the racing class. It is apprehended that there may be some accident or disaster in places of sports and entertainment and probably in the last two-thirds of November some bad fire or panic in a hotel, school, or theater involving wholesale injury to women and children. Let all custodians of public buildings, school houses, theaters, hotels and places of amusement see to it that the responsibility for no disaster of such a nature can be laid at their door.

There will be harmony between the people and the governing authorities and general approval and endorsement by the people of administrative action. Some conflict of authority or lawlessness is indicated in our extreme northwestern territory with probability of earth tremors and turbulent wind storms and injury to grass ranges or growing crops in the northwest, affecting cattle quite seriously.

The diseases likely to be quickened and which prove more fatal to mankind than usual are those affecting digestion in which the liver and bowels are primarily involved. Typhoid, malarial and bilious disorders are likely to prove more frequent and obstinate than usual.

CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR SEPTEMBER, 1899.

SEPTEMBER 1—Friday. On this day make applications to officers of large corporations or government officials for favor or advancement; conditions favor the pursuit of the antiquary and chemist; but do not have any dealings in real estate nor make purchases for trade.

2—Saturday. Push business of all kinds; consult thy dentist, engage in surgery, experiment in chemistry, trade in cattle or metals, and travel; deal in such commodities as coal, iron, petroleum, wood, lumber, lead, wool and grain, and with discretion in mining and railway stocks, if thy nativity likewise favor; make contracts for building and repairing; deal with machinists, engineers, miners, also persons in fiduciary capacities. Money transactions are generally favored and literary ventures should be urged to the utmost; do important correspondence, execute deeds and writings, hire help and purchase merchandise for trade.

3—Sunday. An excellent Sabbath day; the efforts of the clergy will be happy and effective; the day gives special enjoyment of the elegant in literature and art.

4—Monday. Improve every moment of this day, particularly for monetary transactions, buy goods for trade and deal with judges and all engaged in the ecclesiastical callings; the artist, musician, and all engaged in the artistic pursuits should waste no moments of this day in idleness or pleasure for the passing time promises unusual advantage from works now begun or executed; this day favors courtship and invites the marriage contract; aspirants for literary or artistic honors should now launch their productions with more than ordinary assurance of success.

5—Tuesday. Seek not profit from dealings in real estate nor expect to find favor with persons advanced in years during the forenoon hours of this day when also baffling and disappointing conditions prevail generally; do not invest thy money in the afternoon when also take care of the pennies; have no work done to the teeth on this day.

6—Wednesday. Have dealings on this day with public officials or managing authorities or superintendents in great corporations or upon large public works; solicit favor from railway officials and from persons of prominence noted for eccentricity of conduct or habit.

7—Thursday. A very fortunate day for agricultural matters and for having any manner of dealings with landlords or in houses or lands, mining properties, lumber, coal, or wool; urge the elegant occupations and the polite arts; do painting and artistic work of all kinds.

8—Friday. Begin this day with the Sun and spare no moments in idleness; the time is specially favorable for the merchant and tradesman and for all engaged in the literary avocations; choose the day for removal, travel, and buying goods for trade; seek money accommodations and speculate if thy nativity favor also at present.

9—Saturday. Do not relax thine efforts of yesterday but urge the pursuit of business throughout the day; fortunate for transacting business with the wealthy, seeking money accommodations and dealing with bankers, judges, and the principal officers of railways and other large corporate bodies; push all honorable pursuits with more than ordinary assurance of success; renew thy stock in trade and urge all commercial contracts to the utmost.

10—Sunday. An unfavorable Sabbath day, being likely to be marked by depressing experiences; and inviting rest and quiet in preference to activity in any direction.

11—Monday. An evil day. The morning is peculiarly unpropitious and bids thee postpone important writings and correspondence and all commercial enterprises. It is unfortunate as a birthday anniversary, as also is the passing time for persons born about the 10th of March, June, or December of past years, as the majority of these are likely to be in the midst of some unusual mental excitements or anxieties, or to be suffering from nervous disorders, especially if they have exhausted their nerve forces by long hours or protracted mental labors in the past few months. Such persons who are mentally infirm generally, are likely now to develop malice and cunning and should be kept under quiet supervision.

12—Tuesday. One of the most unfortunate days of the month; undertake nothing of importance if thou wouldst have it succeed and avoid exposing thyself to danger. Indeed, the 48 hours ending with the midnight of this day embrace planetary combinations of unusual evil, inviting rest, quiet and extraordinary care in all respects. REGULUS cautions his friends against entering at this time upon any new business or enterprise, for nothing now begun will prosper, nor should any permanent benefit be expected from the general transactions of the day; travel not if it can be avoided and beware of incurring the displeasure of those in authority; government officials and officers of railroads and other large corporations will not be favorably disposed; the criminal classes are unusually disturbed and moved to the commission of crime and acts of violence; the vital energies are low and sudden collapse in all serious afflictions is to be guarded against; the day is greatly to be avoided for any matrimonial contract; many very strange and ill-assorted marriages are effected at this time and disappointment, poverty and unhappiness will fall to the lot of the greater number who now assume the matrimonial yoke; ladies should not allow any alluring prospect of riches to influence them at this time to make any engagement of the above nature. All persons born as indicated in the preceding paragraph will need to exercise unusual care in all their business ventures in these passing weeks and in all matters of health; ladies, so born, are now in the midst of trying experiences in family, domestic, or heart affairs. Some bad cases of brutality towards the female sex are indicated for this time and a sort of epidemic of suicides prevails. Let all be patient, if born as indicated, and put up with evils that exist rather than to fly to others unknown.

13—Wednesday. The week so far has been a very unfortunate one that could not be recommended for any important venture; to-day brings some marked improvement in conditions and best efforts should now be put forth; every moment should be improved diligently pushing all manner of business, signing deeds, entering into contracts and pursuing literary avocations to the fullest extent; let special preference be given to the noon and afternoon hours for the most important work.

14—Thursday. The forenoon is baffling and disappointing and no business deals should be inaugurated then, especially concerning houses or lands, or any products of agriculture; the evening is better for the musical and artistic pursuits and enjoyment of the drama.

15—Friday. Bridle the tongue in the morning hours and keep out of all kinds of disputes, but as the day advances let all efforts be crowded, particularly in the direction of the literary labors and mental exercises; commercial contracts are to be urged vigorously on this day.

16—Saturday. The day after the early morning is a good one and should be fully improved for the major undertakings of life; preference being given, if any, to the mechanical pursuits.

17—Sunday. The forenoon conduces to happy efforts of the clergy, giving unusual volubility to the tongue as well as eloquence and zeal to pulpit discourse.

18—Monday. Arise betimes and urge all monetary engagements before the noon hour; solicit money accommodations and make purchases for trade as early as 9 o'clock in the morning, if possible; the noon and afternoon are less to be depended upon and forbid the execution of any contract pertaining to houses and lands or that is concerned with printing or publishing; see that no deceit is practiced as the afternoon advances and give a wide berth to persons advanced in years.

19—Tuesday. Unpromising for dealings in decorative or ornamental goods, nor should the time be taken for any important social, musical, or dramatic entertainment or the pursuit of pleasure in any direction; beware of leading thy fair one to the altar in the first half of the day, nor need much advantage be looked for in any of the elegant or artistic pursuits; the evening is favorable for engagements with persons noted for eccentricity of habit and should be used for correspondence with government officials or dealers in patents or newly discovered secrets.

20—Wednesday. Have dealings on this day with the laboring classes generally and also with persons who are engaged in the agricultural pursuits; though the day is not recommended for any writing pertaining to lands or mining properties.

21—Thursday. Fully employ the forenoon in thy several avocations, but have care as the afternoon advances not to be led into controversies; be not oversensitive in the dealings with thy fellowmen; and do not embark in any undertaking concerned with machinery or drugs, or chemicals; avoid chemists, bakers, brewers, tanners, cutlers, glass manufacturers, and generally all workers in metal.

22—Friday. Have care of the purse in the forenoon when speculations are best not indulged in; do not buy goods for trade except in limited quantities and to "tide over" nor be extravagant or make needless purchases; seek no favors from female employers or superintendents in the afternoon, when the fine arts suffer some detriment or give dissatisfaction.

23—Saturday. Conflicting conditions prevail in the first half of this day, not encouraging any kind of bargain or sale of land or its products; literary undertakings are favored and important correspondence should be urged; seek advantage from thine employer or superior in the afternoon.

24—Sunday. There is little of promise for this forenoon, especially of assistance to the clergy, those connected with religious worship, or for matters of an ecclesiastical nature.

25—Monday. Be in no haste to begin thy labors on this day especially if they pertain to matters connected with houses or lands, or such commodities as coal, wood, lumber, or agricultural products; the middle and latter hours of the day are the best and should be fully improved for the honorable pursuits in life.

26—Tuesday. Have care in all contracts or agreements pertaining to the elegant pursuits or any of the artistic productions, as such matters are not favorably influenced; engage in chemical experiments and in the prosecution of business dealings in cattle, metals, machinery, cutlery, and with those engaged in the mechanical trades.

27—Wednesday. Have no transactions at this time with persons who are eccentric in habit or as to dress; or who are concerned with patents or patented goods; avoid railway authorities and do not expect much civility from railway employees or public officials.

28—Thursday. Begin the day early and urge all business diligently; REGULUS particularly urges his friends in the intellectual pursuits to press their several vocations to the utmost and recommends the day equally for the merchant, tradesman, and traveler, for change of residence and dealings with printers, booksellers, stationers and counsellors, and for having transactions pertaining to patents, trade-marks and patented articles.

29—Friday. Use the first half of the day to its fullest extent, especially for all the elegant transactions, and for art and music; also for dealings in wearing apparel and for the gratification of mankind; the afternoon forbids purchases for trade and cautions prudence in expenditures.

30—Saturday. Give attention on this day to thy dealings in houses and lands, and agricultural and mining products, also with persons in the very laborious and dirty avocations generally.

—THE—

A WONDERFUL INVENTION. BEST TRAP IN THE WORLD for CATCHING FISH, ANIMALS, AND ALL MANNER OF GAME.

A wonderful and most ingenious device. It is easy to set, suited to any bait, can be used anywhere, nothing CAN ESCAPE UNTIL RELEASED. Every fish, muskrat, or squirrel which bites at the bait is surely caught. Perfectly safe for children, will not rust. One bait will catch from 20 to 30 fish. Will spring in any position; in short, it is a grand triumph over the unsafe and uncertain common fish-hook. Highly recommended by the Tribune, World, Press, and the Turf, Field and Farm. The Ohio Farmer says: "The Eagle Claw is a very ingenious article. The best device for catching fish and game we ever saw. Safe, sure and convenient." No. 1 is for all ordinary fishing, the ladies' favorite. No. 2 is for general use, both large and small fish and game. We have sold thousands, and they have all given splendid satisfaction.

PREMIUM OFFER. We will send a No. 1, Eagle Claw Hook and our splendid monthly paper six months on trial for only 30 cents; or, send us 50 cents and we will send the No. 2, Eagle Claw-hook and our paper on trial six months. Price, per dozen, by express, No. 1, $2.25; No. 2, $3.60.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

AGUINALDO'S HEADQUARTERS.

DECIDEDLY the situation in the Philippines is, to say the least, unpleasant. On one hand we are assured from official utterances that the situation is everything that could be desired and that as soon as the rainy season is over the insurrection will be promptly quelled. On the other hand it is claimed that our army is practically penned up in Manila, and notwithstanding the many successes which we have made it has been impossible to hold the ground which has been gained time and again without costly struggle. The truth probably lies part way between the two statements, and it will be necessary to have a much larger army in the Philippines to garrison the points which are successively won. It is an easy matter to criticise and tell how the campaign should be run from the comfort of an office at home, but it is a very different matter handling successfully an army in a comparatively unknown mountain country and to quell a formidable insurrection which partakes both of the character of regularly organized warfare and the more wearing and dangerous part of campaigning, guerilla or bushwhacking war.

Another source of weakness just at the present time is that a large part of the volunteer soldiers are returning home. These men are acclimated and have really become veteran fighters. Their places are being slowly refilled by regulars in the service. With the islands garrisoned as far as possible and with quite a large army at Manila, there are available only from four to seven thousand men for active operations, and while criticism is easy it is impossible for so small an army to fight and at the same time furnish garrisons for every point which is captured.

The administration realizing this condition, while loth to call for volunteers, are rapidly organizing an increased army of regulars enlisted for two years. There will be an increase of some 35,000 or 40,000 men sent to the Philippines and it is almost certain that with such an increase the insurrection will be speedily quelled. Meantime the campaign is comparatively inactive, and with one exception there has been nothing exciting for some time. An expedition of about one thousand men was surrounded by the insurgents and would have been annihilated but for the timely intervention of the naval forces. This is the nearest we have had to a defeat in the present campaign.

People who are thoroughly conversant with Malay characteristics state that the Filipino, when inspired by desire for revenge, is a formidable enemy; but once convinced that he has made a mistake, these feelings leave at once and he is a pacific and quiet citizen inclined to keep well within the law. Upon this trait great hopes are being formed for dealing with the Filipino masses. It is believed that as soon as they are convinced that the Americans are actually their friends and that they are to have better government, a lesson which they are rapidly learning from every point where the Americans are in control, they will rapidly become good citizens.

The testimony of all people who have lately become familiar with the Filipinos is to the effect that they are far above the average Cuban, both in education and ability, and that they are really very desirable people of good traits of character as a whole. It must be remembered that for three centuries they have been under the dominion of a foreign government; and that they naturally look upon foreigners as meaning rapacity, tyranny and mendacity. It will take some time to overcome the traditions of generations, but it will surely come and bring with it peace, order and happiness as has been the case in the British possessions every time where similar opposition has been made to that nation when first taking possession.

Readers of COMFORT will judge newspaper statements upon the situation as rather overdrawn, remembering that the question of the future government of the Philippines is very probable to be a prominent question in the next national political campaign and that many of the statements made by the so-called anti-Imperialists are being put abroad at the present time to inflame people against the policy of the administration. It is to be remembered that this country has taken no definite stand as to what the future of the Philippines shall be further than that they have paid to have Spain leave them and that the possession must be in the hands of the United States. Misleading statements are continually made representing Aguinaldo as another Washington and the insurgents as similar to the Continental Army in the days of our Revolution; but to any person who has followed the events the situation is entirely different, Aguinaldo being an adventurer, having but a comparatively small part of the people actively with him and being a despotic and ambitiously selfish man. The policy laid down by President McKinley at the Boston dinner is the only one which can really be followed, and that is that neither the President nor any other person can make the decision nor is it right to do so without authority; but that until Congress shall have determined exactly what line is to be taken, it is the duty of the government to uphold the United States in its ownership and to forcibly repress any insurrection against that power.

One of the instances that has recently come to light is of considerable interest to Americans, and that is that for six months thousands of papers and pamphlets were published and distributed among the Filipinos, who are generally fairly well educated, portraying the Americans as the vilest people on earth and much inferior in every way to the Spaniards. It is said that these stories magnified every unpleasant instance in connection with the Indians and pictured innumerable lynchings and burnings as the customary way of punishing men; and going back to the days before the Civil War, gave pictures of slave life and taught the Filipinos that that was to be their lot as soon as the Americans had conquered. The effect of such literature can easily be imagined, and it has been one of the greatest obstacles with which our people have had to contend. The effect is very much heightened by the action of the people opposed to the administration who have played into the hands of the enemy by furnishing them all kinds of hope and encouragement.

One of the distorted stories told by the "yellow" papers of the campaign was in effect that men, women and children were ruthlessly massacred and slaughtered at Malabon. Now comes Professor Worcester, one of our commissioners, who has personally followed the army and examined every battlefield from Caloocan to Malolos—often before the burial of the dead or the removal of the wounded. He has never discovered either dead or wounded women or children. Nor have prisoners ever been killed. On the contrary, insurgent wounded have been tenderly cared for by our American soldiers, who have shown as would be expected humanity, self-control and chivalry at all times. War is always bad enough but it is more than indecency to publish such revolting stories merely to pander to depraved tastes for sensationalism; or, what is worse, to recount such stories for political purposes.

HON. BELLAMY STORER.

The appointment of a new board of commissioners on the Nicaragua canal project by the President has called renewed attention to that enterprise. There is no reason to doubt that ever since the last congress failed to pass any bill relative to this undertaking there has been very much thought given the subject; and that a very great proportion of our people, remembering the Oregon's flight around Cape Horn to meet the Spanish fleet a year ago, believe that such a waterway should be made. There are many rumors of the railroad influence being against it and also of jobbery in connection with the proposed canal; but undoubtedly the larger part of our citizens believe it should be completed at once. We are no longer an infant nation and our sudden coming into power in the Orient makes it necessary that we should always be in a prepared state of defense.

In a previous article COMFORT told at length about the present enterprise. It is probable that no other enterprise of similar nature has ever had the attention which has been given the proposed canal. As early as 1836 DeWitt Clinton with other capitalists first surveyed it. The great rush of people to California after the gold strike of '49 caused a Vanderbilt syndicate to survey it again, and altogether nine surveys have been made. It is the belief of every practical man that there is no reason why the canal shall not be more of a success than ever the Suez canal has been since it was built. The success and experience of the latter has been made a basis of the expectations of the Nicaragua, and it is calculated there will be at least 5,000,000 tons shipping annually at a toll of an average of $1.50 a ton. Had this canal been completed the Oregon instead of sailing 15,000 miles would have been saved two-thirds the distance. Incidentally it is well to know that from New York to Manila is 200 miles shorter by Suez than by the proposed way.

Speaking of this canal reminds COMFORT that the largest canal ever devised is now being constructed by the Russian government connecting the Baltic and the Black seas. When this is completed Russian warships will be able to pass from her southern to northern boundaries without the necessity of making a voyage through the Mediterranean Sea and on through the British channel. The entire length of the way is 1080 miles; but of this 850 miles are on rivers, leaving the remainder to be excavated.

The situation in the Samoan islands remains comparatively unchanged. The king has been deposed and the joint commission representing the three powers—America, England and Germany, has undertaken the government of the islands. This has led to the disarmament of the natives and a peaceful and secure situation. It now appears that Chief Justice Chambers has taken a wise course and that his various decisions for the government of the islands and their laws will have the support of the commission. Chief Justice Chambers has been a most prominent figure throughout the whole trouble and apparently has shown great tact and decision in dealing with the various factions which have supported the native claimants for the crown.

One of the most noticeable features of the recent celebration of July 4th was the universal recognition of the day both at home and abroad. The leading position which America has taken in the affairs of the world in the past year caused most general attention to be paid to the anniversary. In every part of the world our flag was saluted, the English being particularly demonstrative and friendly. In our own country more powder was burned than ever before, and the noisy demonstrations were noticeable in every city and hamlet. It would be impossible to calculate the amount of money expended in these celebrations. China exports about $40,000,000 worth of firecrackers a year and over two-thirds of these are burned in this country, which is but a small part of the amount. It is said that about a score of American boys in Havana showed the inhabitants for the first time what a celebration meant, much to the surprise of local police which had orders not to interfere.

One of the pleasant features of the day was the very general display of American flags and bunting in the Cuban cities and a particularly enthusiastic celebration in San Juan, Porto Rico. On the whole the progress of American rule in Cuba is entirely encouraging and is evidently rapidly gaining respect and encouragement of all the better class of inhabitants.

Hon. Bellamy Storer, our newly-appointed minister to Spain, has presented his credentials at the court of the Queen-Regent and been pleasantly received. Diplomatic relations between the two countries accordingly have returned to the position in which they were previous to the recent war.

THE BLACK PEARL OF SULU.

A Story of the Philippine Islands.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY M. B. THRASHER.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

ONE day at dinner, after I had returned to Manila, I told the story of the Voodoo Queen of Cagayan. The man who sat next me seemed so deeply interested that he attracted my attention, particularly, and after we had left the table I was not surprised when he came and spoke to me. I knew him simply as a scientific man of some kind.

"We scientists have strange adventures," he said, after we had lighted our cigars. "I have been out here for three years, collecting for the State University. I came up a month ago from the southern islands." He smoked in silence for several minutes, before he spoke again. What you said about the chloroform made me think of something which happened to me not long ago.

"Sulu, you know, is one of the most southern of the large islands, and one of the nearest to Borneo. The people themselves call the island Jolo, and they are spoken of by their neighbors as Joloanos. By religion they are Moslems, and although they have been nominally under the control of Spain they have really been ruled by a Sultan of their own race. This sovereign when I was there was a middle-aged man.

"I had not been a fortnight in Maibun, the capital town, though, before I learned that the real power behind the throne was the Sultana Hegu. One day I was out on the veranda of my house sorting over some corals, when I saw a strange procession coming down the street. Sulu is the greatest place to get corals you ever saw. I found quantities of rare specimens, and three species never before described. The pearl divers got them for me. The pearl fisheries in Sulu are the richest in all the islands, but they are little worked, for all the pearls above a certain size go to the Sultan, so that all the divers get are the small pearls and the shells.

"When the procession came near my house I saw that six stout Joloanos were bearing on their shoulders a litter on which a woman reclined. On one side of the litter walked a sort of major domo, or escort, and on the other a slave bearing a huge umbrella. As they passed my house I saw the woman turn and speak to the guard, who looked at the pile of corals I was sorting, and replied. The woman's face was partly veiled, but as she turned to question her escort I saw her plainly. She was young, and though dark, was beautiful.

"Juralato, my native helper, was working with me. 'Who was that?' I asked, turning to him.

"To my astonishment I found Juralato down on his knees, with his face towards the street, bowed forward until his forehead touched the floor. After the cavalcade had passed he straightened himself. 'That was the Sultana Hegu', he said, answering my question. 'The Sultana.'

"Afterwards he told me more about her. Hegu, it seemed, was a Visayan girl, brought a slave to Jolo to be sold. The Sultan had seen her and been so fascinated by her beauty that he had taken her and made her his favorite wife. That had been three years before. Rumor said that he had regretted his bargain since, for prosperity had developed an independence and a temper in Hegu which would have had her strangled before now if she had been less beautiful or less skillful in diplomacy.

"Juralato openly wondered how long it would be before Her Majesty would be put out of the way, and one day when we were being paddled in from the coral reefs and met going out the state boat of the Sultan, a long, low craft with many carvings and draperies, he declared the deed must have been done and that the Sultan was making a voyage to another town of the island to find Hegu's successor.

"That night I woke to find my body held firmly in the hammock in which I slept, while a thick cloth was being bound tightly over my mouth. Before I could twist myself free to shout for help a native's voice close to my ear said distinctly:

"'Let the Senor not fear. It is a very little thing which is wanted of him, and if he will only lie quiet he shall not be harmed. But if he be not quiet, it is not to us the difference will be made.'

"The room was dimly lighted, but by the light I could see a native standing on the other side of the hammock, with a barong raised to strike. A barong is sword, axe, saw, and bayonet, all in one, in the hands of a Sulu. I had seen them clip a goat's head from the body with one blow of the weapon, and then with another blow cleave the carcass from neck to tail. There was no one in the house except myself, so it did not take me long to decide to lie quiet.

"Producing a rope of cocoanut fibre the native who had spoken to me, beginning at my feet, wound it around me in the hammock until I was swathed from feet to neck as tightly as an Egyptian mummy, except that one arm was left free from the elbow. The reason for this I saw a moment later, when I was asked:

"'Where does the Senor keep the sweet smelling water which makes monkeys sleep dead?'

"I knew at once that he meant chloroform, for that was the way the natives who had seen me kill specimens with the drug always spoke of it. I pointed to the door of the next room. The two men picked up my hammock and carried me there. I pointed again to a chest, from which, directed by my signals, that one of the natives who seemed to be the leader, took two pint tin cans of chloroform and put them in a bag which hung from his shoulder. 'What else does the Senor use?' he asked. I pointed to a bunch of wild cotton and some cones made of banana leaf; and he put these with the cans of chloroform. Then he tied a cloth over my head in such a way that I could not have pulled it off with my one free hand, even if I had tried to do so. In the darkness of this covering I felt my hammock taken up again and carried with a swift steady motion. I tried to judge something of the direction in which we were going, and of the distance covered, but found I could not.

"When the cloth was taken from my face I found the hammock had been swung in a large, brightly lighted room. I felt quite sure that in no house in Maibun except the royal palace of the Sultan could so large a room have been found, but of this I had no real knowledge. The same two natives were with me, but in the brighter light of this room each wore a mask of cocoanut cloth. One of them stood as before, with his barong poised ready to strike. The other, when he had unwound me from the hammock and helped me to my feet, led me to a table at one end of the room on which was one of the cans of chloroform and the other materials which we had brought. On the floor beside the table was a bamboo cage in which half a dozen monkeys were confined. Reaching deftly among them the native brought one out, and holding him down on the table said, 'Will the Senor make the monkey sleep dead?'

"The table stood near one end of the room. The wall there was one of the light bamboo partitions which separate the rooms of a Sulu house. What first made me think that I was being watched from behind this partition I do not know, but before I had pressed the banana leaf cap over the monkey's nose I felt sure the native who had handed me the animal, and the other, standing like a statue with his poised barong, were not my only audience. Who or what was watching me through the meshes of the bamboo wall I did not know, but somebody or something was there.

"When the first victim lay still I was handed another, and then another, until three lay side by side upon the table. The time I spent waiting for the animals to die passed the most slowly of any in my life. I could not speak, the natives did not, nor did the bamboo wall, although I felt sure it might.

"When I made a sign that my task was completed my guide said, turning towards my hammock, 'Will the Senor let us take him home?'

"I climbed back into the hammock, was tied up once more, had my face covered as before, and was carried home. When my hammock had been swung in its usual place the man who all along had been the spokesman said, 'I have the honor to thank the Senor for his kindness. I trust,' he added, with a significant look at the barong, 'that no one but the Senor will be informed of our visit.' With that they went away.

"It took me an hour, with only one free hand, to get the bandage off my mouth and free myself from the hammock. By that time the men would have been safely out of reach, even if I had wished to follow them, which I did not. I felt sure they were the two Visayans who had attended the Sultana the day her litter had been carried past my house. I carefully removed all trace of their visit before Juralato came in the morning. While I was doing this I noticed that the men had even brought back with me the empty tin can from which we had used the chloroform.

"I had already been planning to leave Sulu that week, for Teomabal, a small island not far away, and did so, bringing my specimens with me. I stayed a month at Teomabal, collecting. While I was there a pearl diver's boat bound north brought the news of the death of the Sultan of Sulu. As he had no heirs the Sultana Hegu ruled as his successor.

"The day before I was to leave for Manila a Sulu prau hove in sight from the south. She dropped anchor in the harbor, and a native came on shore from her, asking for me. I knew him at once as the Visayan escort of the Sultana and my midnight visitor, but not a muscle of his face showed that he had ever seen me before.

"'I have the honor to deliver this package to the Senor,' said he, handing me a small bundle. Saluting gravely, he returned to his boat, and in less than an hour the sails of the prau were bearing her southward again.

"I untied the cocoanut fibre covering of the package to find the second of the two tin chloroform cans taken from me that night. Something inside it rattled. Had some one sent me a child's rattle? I unscrewed the top and turned out into my hand, this."

The teller of the story touched the spring of a large gold case which he had taken from his pocket, and held out towards me a superb black pearl, so large and perfect that almost no one but an Eastern monarch could have hoped to own it.

"You will hardly go back to Sulu," I said, when I had done admiring the beautiful jewel.

He did not answer at once, but looked at the pearl, clicked the case shut, and returned it to his pocket. When he did speak it was to say, "I shall go back there as soon as I can travel safely."

The way he looked when he said this made me wonder, thinking of it now, if, after all, the gem he had shown me was for him the real "black pearl of Sulu."

Men are strange creatures, sometimes.

Absconded—The Treasurer of the United States.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY KATHERINE E. LETTS.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

"ALL about the great robbery!" shouted a newsboy. "Scandal in high life! Embezzler on his way to Canada!"

I was just swinging onto the morning train as it pulled out of Thompkinsville for Philadelphia. "Here," I shouted. The boy ran up and extended a paper as I reached out for it, but being a sharp business boy, and not seeing the money in my fingers, he drew it back again and I was carried on.

One glance had shown me, however, that his call was correct, for across the head of the first three columns, in huge scare type, were the words—and as I sank into a seat and settled myself for a comfortable ride I began to think it over. What possibilities lay in those few words! So great were that official's powers and responsibilities that he could steal moneys to an extent that would make the average embezzler ashamed of his profession. He was not limited to what bonds and notes he could carry away in a hand satchel, for he could boldly order his clerks and underlings to pack up millions of the bulkier treasure, the gold and silver coin, and ship it to such points as he should designate. If he laid his plans carefully, and struck boldly enough, he could vanish to some foreign country and become a prince among men.

ABSCONDED—THE TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES

The person of the treasurer of the United States is of greater or less importance, depending largely on his own inclination and temperament. Like the president, he can go wholly unguarded, or can be watched over day and night by Secret Service men, ready to protect him from the assaults of cranks and footpads.

Of course the treasurer does not carry the bulk of the national gold reserve in a belt inside his shirt, nor does he carry home the greater part of the greenback circulation for safe-keeping under his pillow. But lots of people may think that he does, and it is a wise man who takes ample precautions.

What a fine thing it would be, I thought, if I could find the treasurer and arrest him. With the man once in hand it ought to be possible to make him disclose the hiding place of all the money he had taken, or, failing that, induce him to return it in exchange for his liberty. I once held a warrant as a deputy sheriff at home and ever since then have had an itching to arrest somebody.

Now it happens that I know Roberts Morgan by sight, and just as my train came to a halt in the station at Philadelphia, I caught a glimpse of a familiar figure approaching from the ticket inspector's gate; a second glance convinced me that the hurrying traveler was none other than the fugitive treasurer. He was holding a handkerchief to his face and this, while serving to conceal his identity in part, did not look sufficiently suspicious to excite the gateman's curiosity.

I sprang from the couch, skipped across two open tracks to intercept him. He removed the handkerchief and I recognized Morgan beyond a doubt. Just as he went to step up to his car I laid my hand on his shoulder. He made no move beyond glancing quickly around, but the next instant I was hit a tremendous blow in the ear that made me hear the roar of falling Niagaras, and another across the forehead that produced showers of shooting stars and similar fireworks. At the same time I was jammed down onto the rails, and rubbed around on the ground. I took little interest in the immediately succeeding events, but was dimly conscious of being hauled off in a wagon through a crowd of people who shouted and danced, through thronged streets to some public building where I was locked in a narrow room.

When I returned to full consciousness I found that I was in an insane asylum. The first sounds that smote my ears were the lamentations of a dreamer of treasured wealth. "He wouldn't let me have it," wailed the voice. "It was my money. He hid it where I couldn't find it. Please let me out, I didn't mean no harm. I'll be straight."

Another voice interrupted, seeking to stay the vapid wanderings of the believer in hidden wealth. "Curse you. Stop your chatter. If I could get at you I'd shut off your wind. Blast your eyes. Stop the racket!"

Evidently some of the lunatics were locked like myself in separate cells; but others walked about in the corridor. One approached a grinning face to my door.

"What's yours?" it said.

"Eh?"

"How did you come to get pinched?"

Apparently "pinched" was the technical word for insane.

"I tried to steal a ride," continued the face. In other words, as I understood, he had probably tried to steal a ride on a railway train.

"Oh, you're the fellow that assaulted Morgan," went on the maniac. "What was it? Did you have something against him, or was it his pocketbook you were after? You ought to have more sense than tackle him in the depot. Besides he's always followed by the fly cops." He came closer and pressed his face against the bars, and then broke into a wild discordant laugh, a frightful imitation of hilarity. "Oh, golly!" he shrieked. "Oh, golly!"

As he staggered off I experienced a feeling of profound pity for this poor mental wreck, and at the same time began nervously to wonder what my own special delusion could be. At that juncture a police officer in uniform entered the corridor and began to read a list of names from a paper. What a policeman could be used for in an insane asylum I could not imagine. Finally he called my name, and then unlocked my door and ordered me to come out and get in line. A lot of other lunatics stood in a row, and a tougher, rougher set of men, black and white, I never saw. They all turned their evil eyes on me and I wondered whether they were dangerous. Some grinned, but others looked frightened. As the policeman passed by I caught him by the sleeve, and nearly got clubbed for it.

"What is the name of this asylum?" I asked.

"This what?"

"This insane asylum."

"Haint you got over your drunk yet? This is the police station—city prison—lock-up."

My neighbors hee-hee'd and haw-hawed, and on looking again I saw that they were only a lot of subjects for the afternoon police court and not lunatics at all. One by one they disappeared through a door, through which as it opened and closed, one could catch glimpses of a gaping crowd of loungers, some tables at which lawyers and reporters sat, and the high bench of the police judge.

At last my name was called and the bailiff aided me with no gentle hand to a position before the court. "Hold up your right hand," shouted some one. "Your right hand. Don't you know your right hand? Drop that hat!" Then another voice repeated over something that sounded like "cold" shorthand notes look, and wound up with "s'elmeged."

A man sitting at a table read an affidavit in which I, W. Beltney, was charged with assault and battery committed on the person of Robert Morgan. "Do you plead guilty or not guilty?" he asked.

I became aware that every one in the room was laughing at me, except the bailiff, who was trying to restore order. On the table I discovered everything that had been in my pockets; purse, pipe, letters and private papers.

"Of course I'm—" I began, to the man who had read the affidavit.

"Make your reply to the court," he shouted.

"Of course I'm not guilty. I was arresting Morgan for embezzlement," I said, facing around at the judge. There was a smile on his face. "What are you laughing at?" I demanded.

Instead of sending me to jail for contempt of court, he pointed toward a mirror. "Go look at yourself," he said.

I looked. The sooty grease into which I had fallen at the depot had plastered itself over my features in artistic smooches that a circus clown might have envied, and I looked the maniac even better than my fellow prisoner of the corridor. They had left me my handkerchief, and when I had wiped away the last streak of grease and cleared my eyes, I turned around and confronted my once fellowtownsman, the Hon. Angus Ohlen, who had left Thompkinsville to dispense justice from the Quaker City police court. He stared for an instant, and then a gleam of recognition leaped into his eyes.

"Well, Beltney," he said, and climbed down from the bench. We shook hands like long lost brothers, to the immense delight of the loungers, one of whom could not resist the temptation to cry, "If mother could only see me now!"

"What is the trouble?" asked his honor, still shaking my hand.

"I learned from the papers that the treasurer of the United States had absconded, and as I saw him making for a train down at the depot, I tried to stop him," I explained.

"And his guards, thinking you meant to assault him, handled you rather roughly, and then sent you in. This is what you saw in the paper, I guess." He pulled a folded Thompkinsville Clarion out of his pocket and displayed the front page. "I was down there this morning; came back on the early train," he added. "Bought the paper just before I started."

ABSCONDED—THE TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES NATIONAL BANK of Thompkinsville.
Short in his Accounts.

Caught about midnight at the Canada line.

"Dismiss the case," said his honor, shortly, as he climbed back to his seat. "Beltney, you had better go into my private room and wash up—and," as the policeman who had threatened to club me deferentially showed me the way, "the next time you see an embezzler running around loose, you had better leave him to the tender mercies of the police!"

WOMEN WHO FAINT.

A MODERN APPLICATION OF THE FAMOUS EPIGRAM, "FRAILTY, THY NAME IS WOMAN."

It is a curious fact that the word faint is derived from a French word meaning to pretend. The word feint, meaning a deceptive movement, as by the boxer or swordsman, has the same derivation. So that originally a woman who fell forward in unconsciousness was merely one who feigned illness. But there is no feigning in that sudden failure of the vital power which blanches the cheek, closes the eyes, seems to stop the breath and sends the woman an inert mass upon the counter at which she is shopping. Fainting is very real for the sufferer who cannot go to ball or theater without this liability to sudden unconsciousness, menacing her enjoyment and safety.

Why do women faint? Women themselves would in this advanced age of progress be the first to deny the charge of physical frailty. They run and row, they swim and ride, they golf and shoot side by side with men. And yet they faint. You rarely hear of a man's fainting. Such a thing is so uncommon as to partake of the nature of a phenomenon. Why don't men faint? Why can a weak framed, undersized man go through life without fainting, when a splendid woman, a Diana for beauty and courage, must know the humiliation of this sudden lapse of consciousness? There is to follow which will bring us safely out from the labyrinth of discussion. There are certain times when a woman is more liable to faint than she is at other times. And those times will be found to be the times when the womanly nature and functions are most dominant. The conclusion is irresistible. As a general proposition a woman faints because the delicate organs by which she is differentiated from brother or husband are affected by disease. Woman is creation's masterpiece, the last and fairest work of the Creator. To her are given joys and sorrows which no man may know and no man can share. To her also is given a capacity for suffering beyond the knowledge of men. The great question is: To what extent is this suffering necessary? Has woman been made so finely only that she may know the refinement of suffering? The very thought is an outrage on Nature. The "new woman" will know nothing of the suffering of the woman of the past. She will "run and not be weary." She will "walk and not faint." Let her put away at once and forever the thought that she is under Nature's particular ban and must suffer because she is a woman. Let her relegate that superstition to the limbo where all the old superstitions that left her a slave have long been relegated. Let her believe that there is a way to sound, physical health which those that seek will surely find.

to escape the physical bondage of weakness is to follow the guidance of other women who have found a way of escape from the sufferings so long esteemed inseparable from the feminine nature.

"For seven years I was confined to bed most of the time," writes Mrs. M. P. Davis, of Honaker, Russell Co., Va. "I had four doctors and they said I could not be cured. I had ulceration of womb and female weakness so I could not stand on my feet but a short time; had bearing down sensation, pain in the small of my back. My stomach and bowels, also legs and feet, would swell, and everything I ate hurt me. I could not sleep well, was so short of breath I could not lie down at night; had soreness and tenderness over womb; troubled with palpitation of heart, and suffered with headache all the time. I would get blind and have fainting spells. After the doctors said I could not be cured I got hold of one of Dr. Pierce's Memorandum Books and read about how he had cured so many patients afflicted like I was, so I thought his medicine might help me. I wrote to Dr. Pierce for advice, and he sent me a very encouraging letter in reply, advising me to take his 'Favorite Prescription' and 'Golden Medical Discovery' and his 'Pleasant Pellets.' I got two bottles and used these and felt much better. I sent and got six bottles more. After I had used four bottles I broke out all over in sores. I then quit taking the medicine and wrote to Dr. Pierce, and he advised me to still keep on taking his medicine. I did so, and soon found it to be a great medicine. I can now work all day and not feel tired at night. I can sleep all night and can eat anything I want at any time. I can walk and go anywhere I please. I feel better than I ever did. Can do all kinds of work in the house and outdoors, too. I am sorry I did not take Dr. Pierce's medicine when I first began to have poor health. I could have saved what I paid to humbugs. My friends say that I do not look like the same woman. When I commenced your medicine I only weighed one hundred pounds. Now I weigh one hundred and forty."

A FAIR EXAMPLE.

The cure of Mrs. Davis offers a fair example of what Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription has done and is doing to make weak women strong. This is not an exceptional case. It is not a solitary case. In more than thirty years of practice Dr. R. V. Pierce, chief consulting physician to the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, Buffalo, N. Y., has treated and cured more than half a million women. Many of these had experienced years of suffering. They had spent large sums of money seeking a cure in vain. Doctors gave them up. Yet Dr. Pierce's treatment cured them; made them happy wives and joyful mothers.

Women who are suffering from weakening drains, irregularity, inflammation, ulceration, bearing-down pains or headache, backache, nervousness or other consequences of a deranged condition of the delicate womanly organs, should begin at once the use of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription in the confident expectation of a complete cure.

Sick women are invited to consult Dr. Pierce by letter, absolutely without charge or fee, and thus avoid the unpleasant examinations, indelicate questions and offensive local treatments so obnoxious to womanly modesty. All letters are held as strictly private and sacredly confidential, and all answers are sent in plain, private envelopes, bearing no advertising or other printing upon them. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y.

There is no alcohol in "Favorite Prescription," neither does it contain any opium, cocaine or other narcotic. It is in the truest and fullest sense a temperance medicine.

A GIFT FOR WOMEN.

We offer free to every woman Dr. Pierce's Common Sense Medical Adviser on receipt of stamps to defray cost of mailing only.

THE TRAIN DISPATCHER.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY J. REVEIRA.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

HE was a typical inventor. There was a painful wrinkle running horizontally across his brow, as though disappointment and he were close friends, and a double vertical wrinkle between the eyes that made you think of him as continually squinting through some intricate machinery, in search of a hitch or faulty gear that interfered with the motion. His hands were stubby and showed signs of hard work and frequent accidents. His age any one might have guessed; but it would have been no more than a guess.

He had already tried a hundred railroads, and was just about to try to bring this plan before the hundred and first when he fell in with Harry Jervis. How they happened to meet, I have forgotten, and it isn't important anyway, but I think it was during one of those fits of abstraction that used to take Harry when he was most in love. It was a curious predicament for a young man to find himself in, but it was a reality nevertheless, and one day he was sure that Agnes was his destiny, and the next that he could never go through the world without her cousin Rose by his side. I suppose the real explanation was that he was in love with neither, though he admired both immensely. At any rate, during these attacks his friends were not far wrong in regarding him as non compos mentis.

How else it was that he happened to be over on the East Side in a cheap sailor's hotel, I for one am not able to imagine. A violent altercation was taking place between the hotelkeeper, who was the bar-tender, on the one side, and an undersized man with the appearance of a struggling mechanic on the other. It was not strictly an altercation, either, for the landlord was doing all the talking, and threatening to masticate and digest his victim while the other was standing on the defensive with a supplicating look on his face.

"W'y didn't ye say ye hadn't any more money, an' leave w'en yer money give out," he roared, "instead o' beatin' a honest man out o' his board bill?"

"You see——"

"I don't see!"

"But——"

"Shut up!"

The small man relapsed into silence, rolling his eyes around the room in search of some promise of hope.

"Why don't ye talk?" roared the other, somewhat inconsistently.

"Why you see the reason I didn't leave so soon as money gave out was because of my invention. I was sure some one would take hold of it. Then I would have all the money I wanted. Why, man, I'll be rich yet! I'll have more money than I know what to do with! When my new railroad signal system, which does away entirely with all danger of collisions, is adopted by all the roads in this country and Europe, doing away with 95 per cent. of the telegraphing now necessary, and doing away also with the personal equation, the element of human fallibility, my income in royalties will be nearly $450,000 a year. I have figured it out carefully."

"Why didn't ye leave w'en yer money give out?" repeated the innkeeper, stubbornly and still unconvinced. "D'ye know w'at I'm goin' to do to ye? I'm goin' to break ye in two!"

Just at this point Harry Jervis interfered and paid the bill. The inventor was all gratitude. He insisted on exhibiting his wonderful railroad signal system, and his benefactor offered no objection whatever. Harry's weak point was mechanics, and from the moment he had heard its owner speak of it, he had determined to see the contrivance.

Up in the dingy little bedroom they examined the gear displayed on the smoothed surface of the bed. It consisted mostly of a large square board painted to represent a map, and connecting several toy cities was a miniature track of tiny steel rails. On this track rolled little wheeled blocks, carrying small electric motors. These were dummies representing trains. In order, the inventor explained, to apply the system to any road, a small copy of the road must be made like the one on the bed; the real railroad must be perfectly wired and each train provided with a special device for sending signals over the wires to the miniature track, and finally an electric battery must be added. Then whenever a train started over the real track, one of the little dummy blocks would start along the dummy track and keep moving while the train moved, stopping when it stopped, and always indicating just where it was in reality.

It took the enthusiastic father of the idea a full hour to explain all the beauties of his system, but when he had finished Harry was satisfied.

"Why don't you get some road to try it?" he asked.

"I have tried," returned the other plaintively, "but they laugh at me."

"Have you tried the Great Windward?"

"Yes, and was almost thrown out of the office."

"Who did you see?"

"Some awfully important man. He had a scar across his forehead and one eyelid that drooped."

Harry laughed.

"That was the reception clerk. He guards the president's office."

"I have talked to superintendents and managers, but never yet to a president," said the man with awe in his voice.

"Come on," said Harry, "we'll try them again."

The inventor asked no questions, but gathered his traps together and they sallied forth and took a car for down town. The clerks in the executive office on Broadway looked up in mild surprise as the president's son piloted a poorly-dressed man and a large package into the president's private office.

"Father, this is a man you will be interested in," said Harry, as the mighty one glanced up. "The president of the Great Windward," he added to the inventor. And then they got down to business.

The upshot of it all was that the fourth division of the Great Windward was wired from end to end, the trains were equipped with automatic signalling apparatus, and in the dispatcher's office on a large table lay a chart of the country from New York to Philadelphia. Over the tiny railroad that connected the cities the little dummy trains were slowly creeping. The dispatcher, a grizzled veteran, with an eye like an eagle and "a face like a dog," as the boys had it, was sitting at his table looking out into the night and cursing softly. The new system did away almost entirely with the multitudinous reports from the conductors of every train and at almost every important stop. The new machine reported for them, and showed him at a glance just where each train lay, in what direction it was going, and at what speed. If two trains drew too near together, either approaching each other or moving in the same direction, he could see it at a glance. But the scheme was new and he wasn't used to it. Therefore he swore.

Now and then he walked over and took a look at the chart and the moving dummies. The inventor stood there looking on too, watching every move, and rubbing his hands delightedly. The dispatcher looked at him and swore again. Then he walked down to the other end of the table and made some remark to Harry Jervis, but Harry at that moment was absorbed in his ever present problem of the two sweethearts and failed to notice. Just then the sounder called and the dispatcher went back to answer.

"President Jervis' private car with special, waiting at Holyoke. Put through to New York soon as possible."

It was an order for the dispatcher from the superintendent of division.

"Who is in the party?" an inquisitive operator called from down the line.

"President Jervis, daughter, Mary Jervis, and Rose Selby. Agnes Selby staying at Holyoke with grip," gossiped back the superintendent's operator.

"Your father, sister, and Rose Selby want to leave Holyoke," said the dispatcher rising and glancing over the chart.

"So?" said Harry, waking up for a moment.

"Yes. The 'Empress' leaves Jersey City in half a minute, but she can pass the special at Mt. Auburn."

He went back to his table and ordered the conductor of the special to start at once and side-track at Mt. Auburn within twenty minutes, until the Empress Express had passed on its way south. At that moment Harry saw the dummy representing the Express start from Jersey City. In another minute the dummy representing the special left the Holyoke station and started to meet it over the little rails, their creeping progress really indicating great bursts of speed from the iron monsters tearing along the actual railroad down in the state. It was just as though the watchers were far up above the world looking down on the road. The beauty of the arrangement even appealed to the cynical eye of the dispatcher. The inventor had come down to that end of the table and was watching the two trains. Harry leaned with his elbows on the chart and wondered whether it was the handsome, stately Agnes down there in the little circle representing Holyoke, or the pretty, petite Rose on the little train drawing away from Holyoke, that he loved.

Some minutes passed, and suddenly the dispatcher uttered an exclamation that is usually omitted in publication. The special had run onto the side track at Peters. "I told him to go on to Mt. Auburn," he shouted, springing to the telegraph key. Five minutes passed; the Empress still crept on toward the south. The dispatcher still stormed at the operator at Peters. Then something else happened that caused him to rip out an imprecation that ended in a howl. The special pulled out from Peters and started north again.

"The enchanted idiot," screamed the dispatcher, "he can't make the side-track at Mt. Auburn now, and there isn't another between the two places, nor a telegraph station to signal them. The operator at Mt. Auburn has quit by this time of night."

The operator at Peters answered just then and blandly informed the dispatcher that the north bound special was not stopping on his sidetrack.

The dispatcher ran back to the chart. The two trains were coming closer every instant. He thrust his hands into his hair and pulled with main strength.

"I hope you don't blame me," murmured the inventor. "It is not my fault, I assure you. The system is working beautifully."

The dispatcher turned on him without a word and knocked him down. Then he ran to the telegraph key again. A gong that had been contrived to ring when two dummies drew too near together now filled the room with an alarm. The inventor picked himself up and in doing so knocked over a table holding the dispatcher's lunch, and the things fell to the floor with a crash. At that instant the trains came together with a tiny splintering sound, reared, and fell upside down on the chart across the rails, while the little motors buzzed like escaping steam. Harry stood over the chart, holding the table with both hands, and face white as death itself. The dispatcher was leaning over his key sending orders everywhere. He called out the wrecking train from Peters with all the doctors that could be had, a special train from Holyoke with more doctors, and another from Jersey City with still more doctors. Then he cursed the entire division under the general O. S. call, shut the key, and dropping his head on his arms, cried.

"What's the matter with the old man?" inquired an operator somewhere down-toward Philadelphia.

"Cracked," answered the Peters operator.

"Screw loose," suggested the Holyoke office.

"Send Doctor Welsh to take charge of the dispatcher at once." It was the division superintendent talking to the down stairs New Jersey office.

"What's the matter with the old man? This is Jervis talking," answered the down stairs New Jersey office.

"That you, Mr. Jervis? This is the superintendent of the fourth division. The dispatcher thinks he has had a smash-up between your train and the Empress."

"She passed us at Mt. Auburn. We made Jersey City with that stop only."

The dispatcher raised his head. Footsteps were heard on the stairs and Dr. Welsh entered. He patted the dispatcher on the shoulder. "Not enough sleep lately!" he suggested. "Come, let's take a walk out in the fresh air."

"You blank blank blank!" shouted the dispatcher, ignoring the doctor and starting towards the inventor, who escaped by the door. Foiled in this the enraged man caught the table bearing the chart and the little trains, and wrenching loose all the electrical connections, jerked it over.

More footsteps sounded on the stairs and Mary Jervis said to some one back of her, "This is the room from which all the trains are controlled. We have a new—why what's the matter here?"

"How do you do Harry?" said Rose, following her friend into the room. "You look as though—oh—!"

It wasn't the sight of the overturned railroad. It was only Harry Jervis who had found out which one of the Selby girls he really loved.

MY ST. CECELIA.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY ELLEN F. WYCKOFF.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

I T was in Florence that I saw the picture. A lovely blue eyed St. Cecelia with softly parted hair and calm, smiling lips. Looking at the face it became more than a picture to me. I loved it. Loved it all the more that my unreasoning passion could bring no change to the waiting beauty of the heaven-blue eyes.

I began to paint the face, giving it, in different pictures, the expressions that would come to a woman who lived and loved and suffered. I worshiped the picture; I studied it. The face, pure as an angel's, the queenly head, the graceful throat and perfect, exquisitely draped shoulders and the little dimpled hands lying on the organ keys.

An old man whose studio was near mine came sometimes to look at the pictures in the gallery. Once he stopped near me. I turned my canvas from him and he smiled.

"It is a beautiful face and a marvelous picture," he said. "It was painted by an American—a Southern man. Oscar Sinclare."

I started, but his eyes were on the picture. I wanted to ask him many questions, but he passed on, and that night a letter came calling me to New Orleans.

I had lived abroad since early boyhood. First with my mother and then alone. My uncle in New Orleans had died and I was his heir. So, without seeing the old artist again I left the city.

My father's sister met me in the fine old hall. I understood that the household was in no way to be changed except that I was to take my uncle's place as head of the house.

"I am glad to see you, Jack," my aunt said kindly. "I've gathered a houseful of lads and lassies to welcome you, for my brother expressly commanded it so. He desired your home coming to be bright with no shadow of his going resting upon it. To-morrow a whole bevy of pretty girl cousins are coming."

The old house was full of light and flowers and sweet odors and gay voices. It was late when at last I sat alone in the quaint parlor that had been my uncle's private sitting room.

"We supposed you'd want it, my dear boy. He loved it and you are so like him. It is a queer place, and not at all to my taste, but being an artist yourself you may fancy it," Aunty said as she kissed me good night and glanced deprecatingly about the room.

Yes, I should like it. I was like my uncle and he was said to be the counterpart of his father, the artist who had painted my St. Cecelia.

The room was very dimly lighted, but my eyes soon became accustomed to the soft glow and I was entranced by the weird beauty of the place. The walls and the carpet were black, and gleaming statuary filled the corners. Pictures and mirrors and shelves of books lined the walls. And at the farther end was a beautiful organ with tall, fluted pipes and beside it, in an alcove with a medallion set in the carved panel of its door, was a quaintly carved, curiously made case. My aunt had told me that the family lawyer kept the key to this case. She had no idea of its contents. It had been her father's and her brother had valued it, chiefly, she supposed, because of the medallion that was a copy of a picture in Florence, she believed. It was only the face with a frame of soft dark hair, but it was my Cecelia's face!

I was very tired and, throwing myself down upon an oriental couch at the end of the room opposite the organ, tried to rest. It was early summer and the tall, slender windows were open. Far below the sweet southern garden was all abloom and the faint night breeze coming from it, stirred the silken curtains at the windows.

Dreamily I lay there, a singular sense of physical comfort upon me. Slowly it came to me that the organ before me was like the one in the picture at Florence. I was too drowsily happy to feel surprise. I noticed, too, that the lights were arranged in such a way as to fall in soft radiance upon the front of the organ.

Then I closed my eyes, and gently, in low whispering cadences as soft as the swish of a sea wave when the air is still, or a ripple of the grass in a slow summer wind, there came to me a sound of music. I held my breath lest the fairy melody be lost. Even the stirring of an eyelid must disturb it. Like the sound of an æolian harp it grew, gently, imperceptibly as the grey of morning changes to glorious day, and then the place was athrob with divinest music.

With every sense I heard it. My whole being reveled in it. I sat up with wide open eyes, every nerve a-tingle with delight. And before the organ, her calm face raised to the light, sat my St. Cecelia!

I felt no surprise. The music was like her. It claimed my whole consciousness just as her picture did. I was happy and that was all. And then lower, softer grew the music, fainter, farther away until it melted into the sweet silence of the summer night.

After awhile something roused me. The wind was blowing. The light above the organ was flaring. I was alone in the room.

In the morning I went down to find a merry group gathered in the hall.

"Jack, this is Muriel Annesly. She is a distant cousin you know. I think you saw her once. Muriel, let me present Jack to you!" I turned to greet my cousin and stood face to face with my St. Cecelia! Last night's mystery was solved.

Aunty moved away and I held out my hand to take the one so timidly extended toward me. "Muriel, did she say? You are a veritable St. Cecelia." I said smiling.

"That was your uncle's name for me. Tell me why?" She raised her calm eyes to mine. Was there a place in these holy eyes for earthly passion?

"My uncle was fond of music; so am I," I ventured. There was no deepening of the pink in her cheek, no falling of the calm eyes.

Afterward Aunty said to me: "Muriel is considered a great beauty. An artist who saw her in New York last winter said she reminded him of a picture in a gallery at Florence. I meant to write you about it, but I always forgot. My father painted a picture that is there, you know. It is a portrait of Marie Winburn—a girl before an organ. Marie Winburn was my father's cousin and he loved her, but she died unmarried and her twin sister was Muriel's grandmother. They say Muriel is like her and I really see a likeness to the picture in the panel in my brother's parlor."

"It is very curious," I said.

"Yes, it is queer how faces belong to families and are handed down like jewels and heirlooms and——"

"Souls," I interrupted.

"Souls! It's well enough that you have quit those horrid old world countries. Souls! Our men have always been queer. You are not well Jack. Mr. Grille, the lawyer has arrived."

"He has the key to the case. I want it," I exclaimed. But when it was in my hand a singular reluctance to use it took possession of me. I slipped it on my watch chain and waited for a change of mood.

It seemed to me that Muriel was a peculiarly silent girl. Not stupid, certainly, and not exactly shy, but preoccupied and far away. She was my picture in warm flesh and blood, my St. Cecelia come to life, but she was cold and unapproachable. It seemed to me that she must feel the intensity of my love.

Each night I crept to the old parlor and listened to the music. She must not know, my timid sweetheart, that I heard. But one night I opened my eyes to find her standing beside me looking down with soft, pleading eyes. If only they were shyer eyes! But they were quite steady, and as she moved I saw a ring on her hand. A circlet of glowing red rubies.

I held out my arms and she drew back and disappeared among the shadows that clung to the walls of the room.

The house being full of young people, it was not easy to find Muriel alone, nor to keep her for more than a moment or so. I dared not speak to her of the music in the old parlor. She seemed so prettily unconscious. But it was a sort of bond between us, and I looked forward to it through each long, bright day.

One night I found her alone on the terrace and she consented to slip away with me to the shadowy old graveyard farther down the quaint, crooked street.

"I shall be able to show you most of the places where our people are buried," she said, as we crept through the jessamine hedge. Clinging closer to my arm she pointed to an old vault. Above it the jessamine flowers shone like white stars. The moonlit night was sweet with their perfume.

"In that vault lies Marie Winburn. A great beauty she was, and a belle in her day. She died young and they say she was laid away with a ring of rubies on her hand and that the woman who wore the rubies always loved the man who gave them to her. But somehow Marie's lover brought them too late. One of the old servants told me that the angels were calling her away and she had promised before her lover came with the ring. The angels took even her fair body to heaven, the old servant said, but I dare say it is crumbling there in the vault with the others. She was my grandmother's twin sister. Sometimes, do you know, I half believe the old story. It is a pretty fancy." She leaned forward, her face quite pale, her eyes dark.

"A ruby ring—you wear rubies."

"I? Oh, no. One wee pearl, and nothing more."

"If I could find a ring like this that Marie wore—if some how the ring, the very one, came to me and I should bring it to you?"

"I should love you," she said simply, and then the far away look vanished suddenly, she laughed softly and threw back her pretty head. "Really, we have lingered here too long. Your grandfather's romantic folly has taken hold of your brain. It was he who came so tardily with poor Marie's ruby ring."

"At least I shall not follow his example in that. You'll be waiting, Muriel—you won't promise——"

She laughed nervously. "Really your head is in a bad way, Jack."

"And is yours quite cool?"

"Quite. You have lived too long in those old world cities. I believe you belong to your grandfather's times. You see I'm a commonsense, fin de siecle maiden, with no romantic nonsense about me."

"And yet last night when you played for me—" I stopped, dismayed at my boldness.

"But it was not last night that I played," she said easily. "I will tonight, however, if you will come away from this gruesome place. You are keeping me away from the others."

"I want to. I should be doing that if you played for me."

"Not in the same way. Come. I shall try the old harp that was mended today."

"The organ—let's slip away to that," I ventured.

"Is there one? Your uncle had me taught, but I did not know that there was one in the house." She had broken off some clusters of the jessamine and white and sweet her face shone above the pure flowers. Watching her and dazed with the mystery I lost control of myself and catching her in my arms I poured out my love in a tempest of passion that frightened her.

She trembled and drew away from me. Then she laughed and said in a playful, nervous way:

"I must wait for the ring, Jack." And then very gravely: "I find no answer in my heart to what you have said to me." Then she turned away and I followed her.

The ring, the ruby ring. Yes, I must bring it to her. I seemed lost in this story. I would find the ring that was buried with the dust of Marie Winburn. A sort of fever burned in my veins.

I watched Muriel with her round white arms across the harp and her quiet, waiting face turned from me. I saw her again as I lay on my couch and she sat at the old organ. What could it mean?

"My darling," I called and she came to me, holding out her hand. I saw the red glow of the ruby ring. As I rose she floated away. Was I dreaming? My head felt dazed and queer.

Next day I went to Dupre, the sexton of the old church beyond the graveyard. He was old and full of histories of people who belonged to long gone generations.

"Where is the resting place of Marie Winburn?"

The old man pointed to the crumbling vault. "They say it is there—my father laid her there, but——"

"Open the vault, Dupre."

He hesitated, and then obeyed.

"It was there that she lay," he said. A crumbling coffin, entirely empty filled the space! Was I going mad?

In the evening I saw Muriel hovering about the quaintly carved case by the organ. When I crossed to her, she was gone. Somehow I thought of the key and nervously unlocked the door.

Shall I ever forget the sight that met my horrified gaze? In the case fastened in a sitting posture was a strange, mummy-like figure, and on one of the bare, ghastly hands, shining like drops of human blood falling through the sunshine was a circlet of rubies set in dull gold!

I stood fascinated with horror. Then a singular coolness came upon me. I removed the ring and closed and locked the case. Ringing for a servant, I sent for old Dupre? And after I had tried the effect of gold as an antidote for curiosity, I bade him take the case secretly away and at once place it in the vault where Marie Winburn's coffin stood.

When he was gone I threw myself upon the couch. It was a sobbing, rain beaten night and the wind moaned at the casement like a creature seeking rest. Sharp flashes of lightning cut through the windy darkness and the earth shook with the sound of the thunder. Restless and troubled I went out upon the long balcony that ran below the west windows.

At the farther end of the balcony I saw a little wind blown figure and went quickly to it.

"Muriel!"

"Jack! I was so frightened and I meant to run this way to Aunty's room; the corridor is so dark!"

She nestled in my arms and clung to me. The touch of her little cold hands thrilled me. And there with the storm all about us and the warm summer rain sending splashes into our faces I slipped the ruby ring on her slender finger and claimed Muriel for my own.

"It is so safe here in your arms, Jack. And, yes, I love you," she said.

Then I drew her into the quaint old parlor and in the glow of the light above the old organ I saw the love light shining for me in her shy eyes.

We are in Florence again. They brought me here after that illness that seized me the night of the storm. But we were married at home, Muriel and I. And some day we are going back and—shall I tell Muriel the strange story of the ruby ring she wears?

A Sud'ra of the Fourth Caste.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY FRANK H. SWEET.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

CHINAB was of the Sud'ra, or fourth grade, the lowest caste of Hindus; and worse, he was near of kin to the San'si, a low tribe of thieves; therefore when Chinab dropped his gaze or rubbed his face in the dust at the passing of a sardar, or head man, he grew pale and trembled, for did not a disgrace affect all kin to a far degree, even as an honor raised them?

It did not so much matter with Sid'ha or Zanim, the brothers, or with Ka'har, the dooly bearer, who was his father. They were like the rest of their kin, of the paoli type, with eyes which naturally sought the ground, and with shoulders bent forward as though making ready to acknowledge the approach of a Brahmin, or Munshi, or even of a Si-pa-hi or soldier. But with Chinab it was different. His eyes were rather of the straightforward than paoli type, and his square shoulders had an obstinate way of remaining square, even when forced forward by the presence of a head man. Ka'har wrung his hands and declared the boy's head was too far away from his feet, and Sid'ha and Zamin added maliciously that monkeys were that way, and that sometimes they hung with their heads downward.

But Chinab went on his way without comment or rejoinder, doing his work after the manner in which his eyes longed to see the world, squarely. Only he sometimes wondered what he would do were he of a caste whose gaze could rise instead of fall.

So it went on until the time of the Me'la, or great fair when Chinab was sixteen.

The first day the zail-dar of his village kept him at work in the banana fields, and the second he was sent to help the yam diggers who were working on the doab, a tract of land lying between two rivers where the soil was rich. But on the third day he was given permission to be absent from sunrise to sunset, and he started early for the Me'la, wearing his bright colored dho'ti and the arm ring of copper which the Sa-in had given him for good work. And fastened securely among the loose folds of his dho'ti were three pai'so, also given him by the Sa-in for his very own.

As his bare, dusky feet flew lightly along the road, the bright colored dho'ti and the three pai'sas, and the warm sunshine, made his heart very light, in spite of the fact that he was of the Sud'ra who should direct their gaze toward the ground. He forgot all that, and the San'si, and the future, and only realized that he was part of the general warmth and joyousness.

It was only when his upturned gaze caused him to almost run against a stately, slow-moving figure that he remembered his caste; and at the same moment he recognized with shrinking horror that the figure was that of his own Sa-lar or prince.

But yet another horror awaited him, for as his knees bent and his abashed gaze fell to the ground, he saw, scarcely more than a yard in front of the slow-moving figure, a reptile whose very name was synonymous of venom.

Thoughts come quick in moments of peril, and like a flash Chinab realized his own possibilities and limitations, and the possibilities of the high-caste Brahmin who was advancing so composedly to destruction. The prince was a man whose ideas were liberal, and whose public service in the past was an indication of even broader work to come. Such a man could be of immense value to the world, while he, Chinab, a despised atom of the fourth caste, and kin to the San'si, was but a disgrace, a blot, a shadow that would better give way to advancement. But he could not spring forward to arrest the progress of the prince, for the touch of Sud'ra would be more dreadful to the high caste Brahmin than even death by the reptile; and there was no time to call out, for even a delay which would allow of one more step forward might be fatal.

There was but one way and Chinab did not hesitate. Even as the foot of the Brahmin poised in the air, a lithe figure shot beneath it and fell prostrate upon the serpent. But it was too late for the foot to retreat. It descended and came in contact with the Sud'ra.

A low cry of horror escaped the prince; not at his escape from death, for he had not seen the serpent, but at the contact.

"Sud'ra," he gasped.

Chinab raised himself slightly, disclosing the serpent, whose head was clasped firmly in his hands.

"Mercy, Most High," he murmured. "Mercy for my presumption."

A quick look of comprehension flashed across the prince's face, in which was a curious mingling of relief and dismay.

"Sud'ra," he repeated.

"Yes, Most High, Chinab, son of Ka-har, Sud'ra and kin to the San'-si."

Chinab raised himself still higher and as he did so a sudden look of doubt came into his eyes, followed almost instantly by one of chagrin. The serpent was not writhing about his hands as it should be; instead, it was limp and apparently lifeless. A quick look caused him to drop it in disgust. The reptile was already dead, killed by some previous wayfarer. Again Chinab's face sought the dust.

"Destroy me, now, Most High," he implored. "It is my caste. It makes even my good intentions evil."

The prince's face had now regained its customary expression of composure and serenity.

"You meant well, Sud'ra," he said, reassuringly. Then, thoughtfully: "There is less defilement from the touch of the third caste than from the fourth. Sud'ra, are you fond of the soil?"

"Yes, Most High."

"It is well. I will give you land in the Ba'ri Do-ab, and a house and cultivating implements. Henceforth you will be an independent farmer, a Vais'ya, of the third caste."

Uncle Sam's Highest Mountain.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

MOUNT McKinley in Alaska, the loftiest mountain in North America, which a party led by myself discovered last summer, will never be climbed," said Prof. George H. Eldridge, of the U. S. Geological Survey. "The ascent of it is a physical impossibility, though not on account of the rarefaction of the air. Mount Everest, in the Himalayas, will forever defy the mountain climber, simply by reason of its altitude—six and a half miles—which is far beyond the altitude where sufficient oxygen exists in the atmosphere to support human life. The same may be said of a few other peaks, the breathing limit being reached not much past four miles of elevation. Mount McKinley, however, is less than four miles in height.

"The trouble is that it is impossible to get within fifteen miles of Mount McKinley. I might almost say within thirty miles, inasmuch as nobody would attempt to overcome the stupendous difficulties of the first fifteen miles who knew what was to follow. The mountain is situated in the midst of a region almost indescribably rugged. Rugged, indeed, is a word hardly applicable, inasmuch as it gives no notion of the maze of frightful gorges, and of canyons thousands of feet in depth with vertical walls, by which all approaches to the mighty peak are barred. Nothing rivaling it in weird desolation and awesome majesty is to be found anywhere else that I know of.

"There is no way to bridge these canyons or to surmount the mighty precipices. They defy to-day, as they will ever set at defiance, the boldest mountaineer and the most highly skilled engineering expert. How literally this is true can be realized only by one who has gazed from a distance upon that labyrinth of rock masses, in the formation of which Nature seems to have played her most fantastic and imaginative pranks. For Mount McKinley is but the highest of a congeries of mountains, though very much the loftiest of the giant range to which it belongs.

"Mount McKinley is 20,500 feet high, the top of its sky-kissing peak being nearly four miles above the level of the sea. It is the highest bit of North America, surpassing Mount St. Elias in altitude by 2,490 feet. Prof. I. C. Russell, who, representing the National Geographic Society, succeeded in reaching a level of 14,500 feet on Mount St. Elias, estimated the height of its summit at 18,010 feet. At this reckoning, St. Elias is nearly 2500 feet taller than Mont Blanc, the topmost of the Alps. In the United States proper, Mount Whitney, in the Sierra Nevada, is highest, its measurement having been determined at 14,898 feet. Mount Rainier may fairly be called the finest mountain in this country; though only 14,525 feet high, it rises to that elevation within a few miles of the sea, producing, with its wonderful crown of snow and glaciers, a very impressive appearance.

"As for Mount McKinley, it has been fortified by Nature against invasions by explorers, who must always remain aloof and be content to gaze upon it from afar. It is defended by obstacles so tremendous that no man will ever be able to attack them successfully. One is at liberty merely to look upon it at a distance, across a multitude of chasms and interlaced gorges. Through the gorges run ever so many glaciers, some of them of enormous dimensions, which at intervals drop incalculable loads of ice into the yawning gulfs beneath. I myself have viewed there a hundred glaciers, all in sight at one time—mighty rivers of solid ice streaming down through channels in the sides of that mighty Alaskan range. The greatest of these glaciers is one of enormous size, which, in melting, forms an affluent of the Sushitna River.

"The Sushitna River is the largest stream that flows into Cook's Inlet, which is an immense bay on the south shore of Alaska. Mount McKinley may be most readily located geographically by describing it as situated about 150 miles to the north of Cook's Inlet. Although Mount McKinley does not stand isolated like Mount Rainier, it rises about 7000 feet above the highest of the neighboring mountains, and affords a most impressive spectacle. Of course, it is crowned with eternal snow, and its sides are seamed with chasms through which glaciers run down. Owing to the presence of so many glaciers, which are continually melting in the sun's rays and thus producing vapor, clouds are nearly always floating about the summit, thus obscuring the view of it. On this account, we were unsuccessful in our efforts to obtain a photograph of Mount McKinley. You must realize it, in imagination, as a peak of very irregular shape uplifted high above the line of a range of the most craggy and saw-shaped sierra in the world.

"I presume you are aware that the highest mountain ascent ever accomplished by man was made by W. M. Conway, who in 1892 reached the summit of Pioneer Peak, in the Himalayas—nearly 23,000 feet above sea-level. You will observe that this was not far from 2500 feet above the altitude of Mount McKinley; but, of course, we have no such elevations in North America as are to be found in the Eastern Hemisphere. Even in South America are to be found mountains which surpass Mount McKinley. For example, Mount Aconcagua, in Argentina, is 22,422 feet high, and it has been scaled. Until recently it was understood that Aconcagua was the topmost bit of real estate in the Western Hemisphere, but it is now asserted that it is surpassed in height by Illampi and Illimani, which uplift their snowy crests from the plateau of Titicaca. These twin monarchs of the Andes are reckoned at 24,000 and 25,000 feet respectively, though they have not been accurately measured."

CONDUCTED BY JENNIE MELVENE DAVIS.

Maurus Jokai, the famous Hungarian novelist, is a strong illustration of the intense earnestness that seems to distinguish foreign writers. He has been for many years closely identified with the stormy political life of Hungary and his patriotism no less than his literary genius has made him the idol of the Hungarian nation. His genius is varied in its expression as he is a sculptor and painter of no small merit. He is also a naturalist, an astronomer and a gardener. He lives near Budapest during the summer and his rose garden is famous. At the age of seventy-four he still preaches a gospel of work by his indefatigable labor. He rises at six and writes almost constantly throughout the day. During his political life Jokai never abandoned active journalism and at the same time found time to write over two hundred books comprising romances, novellettes, short stories and a few dramas. Among the books that have been translated into English are Black Diamonds, Eyes Like the Sea, An Hungarian Nabob and the Nameless Castle. Jokai was left an orphan at the age of twelve. It was a struggle for him to complete a High School course of study but he succeeded and was finally admitted to the bar. He had little liking for the law and abandoned its practice for a literary career. He became editor of a newspaper and led an uprising to release from the fortress of Buda a newspaper man who had been imprisoned for his articles written in defense of Hungarian liberty.

From that time he was one of the leaders of Hungary's struggle against Austria for its ancient right. When the rebellion failed Jokai and his wife escaped in disguise and spent many months in a little hut hidden away in Northern Hungary. He finally gave up the idea of complete independence for Hungary and threw his influence into the compromise of 1867. For nearly forty years Maurus Jokai has been a member of the Hungarian parliament. Since 1896 he has been a member of the House of Lords which is a life office. He was selected to pronounce the funeral oration over the body of Kossuth as it lay in state at Budapest. The celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of his first book showed Jokai how near he was to the heart of the Hungarian people. Among his gifts were $80,000 and a hundred paintings representing scenes from his novels, painted by the leading artists of Hungary. It is hard to say whether it is his position in the world of politics or his position in the world of letters that has made Maurus Jokai the popular idol that he is to the Magyar nation.

The royal family of Belgium has been rather tragically conspicuous among the royalties. King Leopold is eccentric to the verge of insanity; the eldest daughter after making two continents ring with her escapades has been confined in a lunatic asylum at the command of the husband whom she deserted. The unfortunate Empress Charlotte of Mexico is the sister of King Leopold. The second daughter is the Crown Princess Stephanie of Austria. The Queen of Belgium by birth is a member of the unfortunate royal family of Austria. She is very popular in Belgium and is noted for her great devotion to all charitable matters. The queen has a great aversion to visiting Paris and although Brussels is but a few hours journey from the gay French capital the queen has been in French territory but once in a quarter of a century. In 1867 her only son the Duke Brabant died very suddenly. At that time it was believed that his death was the result of a political intrigue that aimed to make Belgium a part of France by removing the heir to the throne. The queen believed the tales that are now considered romance and has resolutely refused to set foot in French territory. Her married life has been notoriously unhappy but the queen has borne herself through all her trials like a high minded woman of principle. She is fond of horses and music. She is considered the best four in hand whip in Europe and rides as well as she drives. She has a thorough knowledge of the art of conjuring and can amuse a company as well as a professional. Her life shows the effort of a bright brave woman to find interests and occupations in the empty splendor of a saddened life.

Miss Melva Wilson is a young Ohio woman who has won recognition in New York. She has the versatile talent that marks so many of the successful women of the day. She writes stories, sketches and poems and illustrates them with great cleverness. She is a descendant of Revolutionary heroes and by birthright and natural instinct is intensely patriotic. Her most successful work is the statue of the Minute Man that now stands in Washington. It is valued at $30,000 and it is hoped that the government may be induced to purchase it. Miss Wilson obtained permission to work in one of the park buildings of Cincinnati and it was here that the Minute Man was modelled in clay. Prominent business men of the city took an interest in the work and a sum of money sufficient to make a plaster cast of the subject was raised. This cast was unveiled in Miss Wilson's western studio in the presence of President McKinley and a distinguished company of guests. Miss Wilson has also modelled "The Visitation of Saint Cecelia" and "Portia." Her work from ideal subjects is very successful but Miss Wilson has a leaning toward portrait busts. She has executed many orders for these and also for the portrait statuettes, that have become so popular with society women who can afford the luxury of seeing their features reproduced in marble.

The troubles in Samoa are to be adjusted by the members of the Samoan commission. The German member finds himself in a very delicate position but Baron Sternberg has had long experience in diplomatic science. He is a young man but for years has taken an active interest in Samoan affairs and is considered the best posted on the subject of any of the German diplomats. He first came to America in 1890 as military attache of the German Embassy. He is a broad shouldered, fair haired, blue eyed man who gains the confidence of all with whom he comes in contact. He has seen service in Peking and was Charge d' Affairs at Belgrade. About a year ago he came again to Washington as first secretary on the staff of the German minister. His election to serve on the commission is considered a great compliment.

"Our Lady of the Snows," as Kipling named our northern neighbor, has given a warm welcome to some of her adopted children. Lord Strathcona of Mount Royal, Canadian High Commissioner to London and multo millionaire is what Canada has made of a plain little Scotch lad. Donald Alexander Smith was born in Morayshire, Scotland nearly eighty years ago. The man who has given nearly $2,000,000 to Canadian universities received all his education in the schools of his native village. When a boy of eighteen he began the struggle of life in the service of the Hudson Bay Company. He came to Canada and for thirteen years his work kept him in the wild northern wastes of the Labrador coast. Then he was transferred to the Northwest. Slowly he rose from the position of a clerk to the head of the great company. He entered political life in 1869 as a special commissioner of the Canadian government to look into the causes of the Red River rebellion. His thorough acquaintance with northern British America made his services of more than ordinary value. He was soon after elected to a seat in the legislature of Manitoba, and later took a seat in the Dominion parliament which he retained until 1880. In 1887, he again sat in the parliament and on his retirement was made Lord High Commissioner to London. Lord Strathcona received his title in recognition of the value of his public services and benefactions. He advocated the Canadian Pacific railroad and this line was completed through his influence. Lord Strathcona has given liberally to the higher education of women. Fourteen years ago he gave $120,000 to found the Donald course for women at McGill University. He is now Chancellor of that widely known institution. He built, equipped and endowed the Royal Victoria College for women giving over $1,000,000 to this one project. He is President of the Bank of Montreal, and the gray old city is proud to claim Strathcona of Mount Royal as her son.

It is becoming more and more evident to thoughtful people that the problem of the future of the negro race must be worked out by the negroes themselves. Lynchings and riots are on the increase, but side by side with the shadows presented by the race problem are the lights that throw out such a figure as Mrs. Booker Washington and such a work as that of the Tuskegee Institute. This school has grown until it numbers over a thousand young negro men and women. It is in the widely known "black belt" of Alabama and its influence is slowly raising the mass of the people to higher standards of living and thinking. Booker Washington is known throughout the world and his wife is no less worthy of admiration for her share in the great work. Mrs. Washington is a native of Mississippi and was educated at the University. She visits the homes of her race within reach of Tuskegee Institute and carries the industrial work of the school into each house. With broom in hand she demonstrates the first simple lessons of cleanliness and industry. This same woman can instruct a thousand women of her race gathered in the same city to hear her speak. The trustees of the Slater fund have engaged Mr. and Mrs. Washington to speak during the next two years to the colored people of southern cities. The work at Tuskegee is not to be given up but the spare time is to be devoted to this missionary work. Mr. Washington addresses mass meetings of both sexes. He speaks in smaller meetings of teachers and ministers while Mrs. Washington speaks to the women. Mrs. Washington has a strong personality. She is gentle and refined in manners but terribly in earnest as to the future of her race. She represents the best possibility of the Southern negro. She knows the conditions of living and the difficulties in the way, but the missionary work she does shows in the vast influence that Tuskegee has over those who come under its instructions. Industrial education will solve much that is perplexing in the race problem.

Chang-Yi is sometimes called the "coming man" of China. He is chief director of the Chinese Engineering and Mining companies and assistant director of the Imperial Northern railways. He has become very wealthy but foreigners who have met the quiet mannered Oriental believe that his wealth has been honestly acquired. He is fifty years of age, of medium height with a face whose intelligence attracts immediate attention. He is said to be wholly without political ambition but to aim to be the Coal and Iron King of China. He does not speak English but his quick observation enables him to grasp ideas and the general drift of conversation by watching the expression. He often anticipates the explanations of the interpreter. He began his business life as contractor for imperial and public buildings and worked at Peking. He saved his money and invested it in banking. He gradually extended his business interests showing a clear hard-headed talent for practical affairs very unusual in the Flowery Kingdom. He has made every business enterprise with which he is connected yield large returns. Unlike Li-Hung-Chang, he says little, rarely asks questions but still obtains careful information before he acts. He has large executive ability but this has been directed solely to practical business affairs and never to any governmental work.

Prince Min Yong Whan is the new Corean minister to this country. He is closely connected with the royal family of Corea being a first cousin of the king. He sailed for this country in April. Prince Whan speaks English very fluently and stands very high in the esteem of foreigners as well as of native Coreans. He represented Corea as special ambassador at the brilliant ceremonies of the coronation of the Czar and served in a similar way at the Queen's Jubilee. He is not a stranger in Washington as he came here after the Jubilee and remained a year. His brother will be his first secretary as he also speaks good English.

Mary Lowe Dickenson is in many respects a perfect type of all that is best in American womanhood. Positive without being aggressive, gentle without being weak she has always been a leader and a teacher. She began her life work in a little country village in Massachusetts as the teacher of the village school. She was earnest, progressive and successful to a degree that attracted the attention of educators. She was soon called to the position of head assistant in one of the largest schools of Boston. From this school she went to the Hartford Female Seminary as an assistant principal. When Mary Lowe was twenty-four Vassar College was opened. Miss Lowe was discussed as the probable vice-principal of the new college for women, but she decided to accept an opportunity which offered a three years residence abroad. With a former pupil she spent this time in study and travel. She was just on the threshold of young womanhood and the effect of these three years upon her character was very marked. She returned to this country where she married Mr. Dickenson, who was a wealthy banker.

Her married life was very happy but her husband died and in less than two years after his death his entire fortune was lost. Mrs. Dickenson found herself again dependent upon her own resources and with undaunted courage she took up the work that she had left upon her marriage. Opportunities for usefulness soon presented themselves. Vassar, Wellesley, and the Universities of Denver and Southern California were among the prominent colleges that recognized Mrs. Dickenson's ability by naming her for a position. She finally decided to go to Denver which then had an attendance of more than a thousand men and women. For two years she gave of her best to the students under her care. Many an earnest man and woman to-day remembers with gratitude the inspiration that Mary Lowe Dickenson gave her pupils. She could not stand the climate and reluctantly gave up her congenial field, but the Chair of Literature named for her shows the appreciation of her work by the trustees of Denver University. Since then Mrs. Dickenson has been closely identified with many of the altruistic movements of the day. She organized and extended the International Order of the King's Daughters and has been the General Secretary since 1886. Mrs. Dickenson has been Secretary to the American Bible Society, President of the National Indian Association and of the National Council of Women. Her writings are well known. Both her prose and her poetry have been widely read, for they have the note of absolute sincerity and sympathy with human effort that has made Mary Lowe Dickenson what she is—an earnest, sympathetic woman whose life work has made the world better.

Folk-tales of our Land.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

NOW and then American writers have sketched in verse and prose a legend which has immortalized a few of our myths. But aside from Salem witchcraft, when we would identify superstitions with any spot of universal interest we look to the folk lore of Germany, Scandinavia, Russia or perhaps anywhere except at home, when of a truth our Great Lakes, Mississippi Valley and Hudson's banks are fairly lined with these tales of fact and fancy.

Longfellow sings the sad story of Evangeline Bellefontaine and Gabriel Lajeunesse, and tells us how John Alden wooed for another and won for himself. "Tales of the Way Side Inn" bring to view Portsmouth with Martha Hilton and Marblehead with Agnes Surriage.

Hawthorne carries us up Mt. Monroe in quest of the Great Carbuncle, and recalls the rigor of the Puritan governor who hacked down the May pole of Merry Mount. While Washington Irving and Joseph Jefferson introduce us to an ancestor of the Van Winkles of today, the hapless "Rip." But most creepy and uncanny of all comes Ichabod Crane with the galloping Hessian en trail. These are the most familiar of American folk-lore because our geniuses have so fascinatingly repeated them.

No race save the Roman has more superstitions than the American Indian, and safe to say no people left behind them so varied a quantity of stories in which we find the foundation of so many legends of more recent origin—one of the prettiest and best known of all is "Hiawatha." According to the Indians the world began when the snake bit off the two lumps of pipe stone, and these receiving life from the Great Spirit walked from the Minnesota Garden of Eden—the redman's Adam and Eve.

"Thundering water" as Niagara Falls was termed, asked for two victims each year. In 1670 or thereabouts the last sacrifice was made when the daughter of the chief of the Onondagas was launched in a white canoe bedecked with lilies and as she went over the falls her father jumped into his canoe and followed her to death. After this his spirit was converted into the ruler of the Cataract and hers to the Maid of the Mist.

The old French legend of the first jacqueminot rose undoubtedly had its origin in the Delaware Indian's story of the girl driven distracted by the death of her lover, who stabbed herself and where each drop of blood fell there sprang up the scarlet blossom commonly known as Indian plume.

Our pondlily's white and yellow is symbolic of the purity and love of an Indian maid who true to her own convictions drowned herself rather than yield to Sun, a young warrior whom she loved but who was betrothed to another. The tribe mourned her loss deeply and one day there appeared on the pond a group of lilies, which opened as the sun came and closed at night when the sun had gone. Thereafter the tribe worshiped the lily-form that the girl's spirit took.

The popular New Jersey mosquito claims for an ancestor the monster insect that ate a tribe of Indians at a single meal and used their ribs as toothpicks. It was, however, eventually killed and wherever its blood spattered there came to life the smaller mosquito which mingles pain with the pleasure of a summer twilight.

These and scores of other tales have been brought down through the ages. But while they are simply amusement for us we must not forget how real these tragedies seemed to the Redman whose gospel was the simplest solution of the mysterious—and after all, religious and scientific investigation has taught us no more of heaven than imagination pictured to our savage brother of the happy hunting grounds.

For one reason or another most New England legends follow the shore. Beginning with Maine it is said at Harpswell the fisherfolk are often startled by the appearance of the death ship, similar in appearance to the one Coleridge describes. His phantom vessel glides in and out of the harbor in the course of an evening bringing in its wake always death and disaster.

We must not overlook the ingenious Lewiston hermit who trapped the fifty Indians, causing them all to be drowned.

Deer Island was once in possession of one Swunksus who challenged an intruder to mortal combat. Unfortunately for him he forgot his engagement and having imbibed too heavily was killed in his sleep. And to this day summer visitors to the island claim they can hear him snore. Mount Katahdin secretly married a beautiful Indian girl by whom he had a son who later was chief of one of the most powerful tribes. According to some traditions Hiawatha left his marks among others at Bar Harbor where he flung to the ground a moose whose bones may still be seen there. Mt. Kineo was a moose of gigantic size which he turned into an elevation of land. On the Isles of Shoals can be seen dimly at night a pirate's wife who was left to guard a treasure.

Gallows Hill in Salem was the scene of all kinds of torture for witchcraft, sorcery and anything condemned as "blackart," and is to this day infested with roaming spirits. "Old Meg" lived in Gloucester until she died from a shot fired five hundred miles away. The story runs thus: Two Gloucester soldiers in the siege of Louisburg were troubled by a crow hovering around their heads. And finally they decided it could be no other than the spirit of Meg the witch. So cutting some silver buttons from their coats they fired them and killed the crow. It afterward appeared that old Meg had died at the identical hour and in the autopsy the self same buttons were taken from her flesh.

On a bit of an island off Swampscott shore (Egg Rock) were supposed to grow forget-me-nots of such power that nothing could separate lovers who possessed any of them. Once upon a time a boy started in a dory to gather some for his sweetheart, but a sudden storm arose as he was returning and he was washed ashore at the feet of his love with the forget-me-nots clasped tightly in his hand.

In Boston Harbor is all there is left of a twelve acre island where pirates were hanged.

NATURAL BRIDGE, VA.

Early in the 18th century a captain named Nix was murdered and his mate accused and convicted of the deed. As he went to the scaffold he called on God to prove his innocence by allowing the island to sink and the water cover it. And in the course of a noticeably short time, just that thing happened. Now only a black pyramid stands on the spot to mark the grave of Nix's mate.

In 1834 a skeleton with armor of Phœnician origin was exhumed at Fall River. This was in the locality where Capt. Kidd's treasure was supposed to have been buried. Longfellow has the viking in armor come to life and tell his own story. A captain cruising with his daughter, Judith, is overtaken by a terrific storm. He has lost his course, but the girl sees land. In the fury of the gale she does not hear her father continually asking her where? but finally he makes her hear "Point! Judith, point!" which she does just in time to save them from the reefs which sailors ever since have called Point Judith.

On the Potomac river are three rocks so similar in appearance that they have been named the three sisters and those who live near the shore declare "the sisters" always moan the night before a drowning or sea disaster. At Natural Bridge, Virginia, flows the lost river where all who have ever drank must return sooner or later.

The white mountain range is full of traditions. The Pilot range gets its name from a dog owned by the guide Willard who lost his way and was led by Pilot the dog safely to his own camp. Skinner's Cave was the haunt of a smuggler some of whose goods are supposed even now to be hidden there. Until very recently near Alton, Illinois, a curious relief made by Indians representing a monster called the man-eater could be seen on the bluffs. This was supposed by the natives to be a representation of a creature existing in the age when all animals flew, swam and crawled.

A pretty story is told of the origin of the white fish. A family were carried across a swollen stream by a crane who cautioned them not to touch his head, but curiosity got the better of the mother whom the crane tossed off as a punishment and the scattered brains on the rocks below took the form of the delicate white fish. Many descendants bear the crane as their token to this day.

Among other legends in Detroit comes to us the one about Marie Liebault, a non-believer who was convinced and converted through a wager with a pious old woman who appeared to her after death holding a white phosphorescent light in her hand. Then there's the tale of the Will-O' The Wisp that led the young girl to the marsh where she found and released her lover who was caught in the reeds and mire.

The natives of New Mexico believed that when Montezuma left earth he planted a tree saying that when that fell he should come back to earth and for years they kept watch until finally it fell and gathering on the house tops they looked eastward only to see the coming of the white man.

Soon after the first rails were laid in Colorado an old engineer named Edwards had a harrowing experience; as he was flying along he heard a whistle behind, and turning a curve he saw another engine on the same track drawing nearer and nearer. He pulled the throttle wide open and lunged ahead trusting fate to get him to the switch before the rear engine should overtake him, and just as he reached the side track along came the engine snowy white with a dough-faced creature peering wildly out and gesticulating frantically. We don't know what came next, but presume if the railroad company had not built a station at just that point, the phantom "flyer" might still be the terror of the western engineer.

When Spain controlled the Southwest a regiment was sent from Santa Fe to carry a chest of gold for the soldiers in St. Augustine, and the entire regiment disappeared somewhere on the route as completely as though they had been swept away by supernatural power. Were they annihilated by the Indians? Did they sink in the quicksands; who can reveal? Not a trace of a single soldier has ever been found to tell the tale, and a stream bears the name of River of Lost Souls.

Finally, returning to domestic affairs, the "Baker's dozen," (which is surely a myth in these days) originated with one Van something or other, an Albany baker who suffered under a witch's curse until he consented to call thirteen a dozen.

This sketch is merely a breath of the tales reeking in blood and shrouded in mystery, that have been left for us to solve or exaggerate as we, too, hand them down. And as we emerge from the labyrinth of the romantic world is it not a relief to feel that no banshee can charm away our souls?

GOLDEN MOMENTS, Augusta, Maine.

CONDUCTED BY EVERETT G. WHEELMAN.

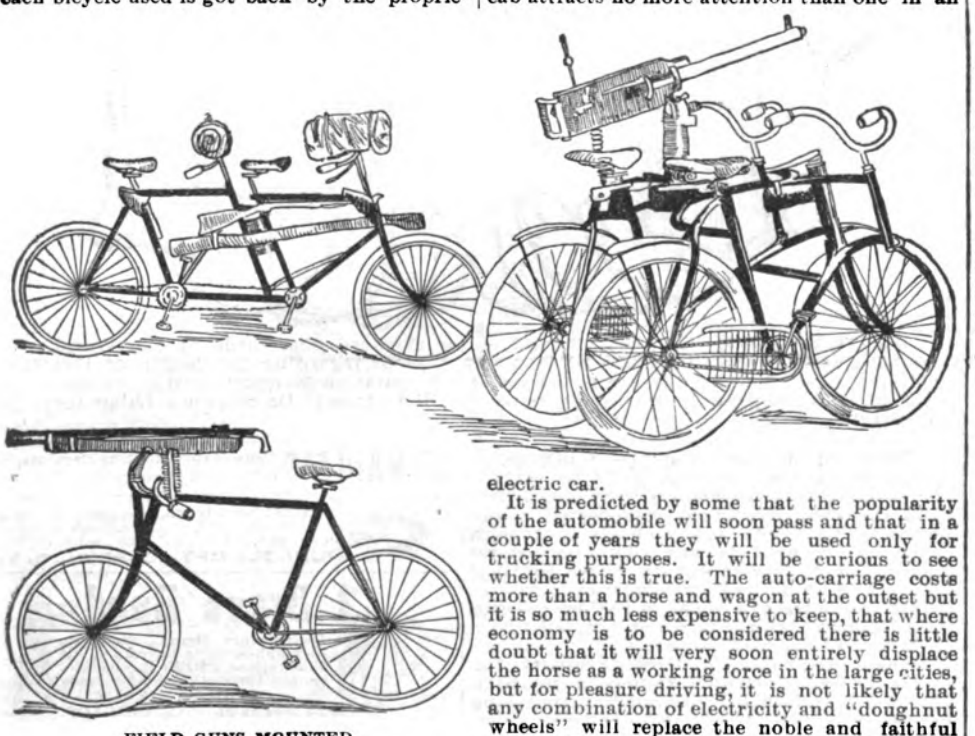
ALTHOUGH the bicycle did not prove of use in the "Yanko-Spanko," war, that does not prove that it is not a valuable adjunct to the soldier. General Miles says: "The results obtained under the most adverse and discouraging conditions prove conclusively that the bicycle will in the future become a most valuable auxiliary in the military operations, not only for courier service but also for rapidly moving organized bodies of men over the country." And under his direction the wheel was put to a series of vigorous tests. Despatch bearers have been sent broadcast from coast to coast and the Gulf to the border mounted on the silent steeds and whole companies of infantry have tried its advantages in field campaigns.

Many experiments have been conducted abroad with a view to establishing the bicycle's exact value and place, but so far not a single country has organized or equipped any considerable portion of its regular forces with the machine though almost all have a small number of men at each garrison who are practised in its use. In England a portion of the volunteer forces are organized as a bicycle detachment and are drilled as mounted infantry. They number about one hundred men and have a battalion organization. Their drill tactics, peculiar to themselves, would hardly receive the commendation of the professional soldier, as the principal features seem intended for spectacular effect and are of little practical value.

In a speech at the banquet of the League of American Wheelmen, General Miles is quoted as saying: "It is estimated that there are in this country a quarter of a million men who are accustomed to ride the bicycle. If out of that number 50,000 men were organized, it would make one of the most effective army corps that was ever marshaled in any country or at any time."

In England the cycle detachment mentioned before has a Gatling gun mounted on a platform placed between four machines, but this would be useless in front of a 4.3-inch breech-loading field piece.

The bicycle railroads are another proof of the onward march of the bicycle principle. Already they have proved profitable speculations on the seashore near New Brighton and on English seashore resorts. Rails are laid on the sands and on them bicycles run, but they are so fixed that no balancing is needed. Thousands of "trippers" patronized these bicycle railways last summer and several new ones are being started. It is said that, as a rule, the cost of each bicycle used is got back by the proprietors within a week, so the profits must be considerable.



The "Boynton Bicycle Railway" was the first in this country. It is just being completed in Massachusetts. The cars are run on a single rail, safely guided and propelled by the overhead electric guide rail, which serves the purpose of electrical propulsion, as current conductor, a sort of third rail equivalent, as effective and much safer above than below trains. By leaning this upper guide on approaching curves under the patents granted, these trains round the sharpest curves by actual experiment at from 60 to 100 miles per hour without the least strain or danger, precisely as a bicycle is tilted, and the exquisitely light train is electrically propelled at any speed in a straight line. The inventor claims that he can connect New York and Boston in one hour. He says: "It will not do to tell the public that we can go as fast as a cannon ball or that 25 miles per minute will eventually be attained is my belief, as the possibility of specially constructed needle trains that I have patented, which at that speed would be entirely cushioned upon the air passing beneath their tapered front. The car runs between two steel girders, safely supported between two steel posts and side rails, and thus grooved above and below and surrounded, is as safe as a bullet while passing along the gun barrel. An accident is simply impossible, unless the structure breaks down, as the body of the car is grooved and would slide if the wheels above and below were broken. They are formed of malleable steel and are unbreakable. With electricity you start and stop as slowly as desired, while in the hundred miles or more of flight increasing force may be applied both above and below the train, so as to constantly accelerate the speed—unlike the cannon ball fired across the English Channel, where speed diminishes after the first impact of explosive force."

A new bicycle bell is coming into use, a perfected model of a signal that was used in the old days of the ordinary. It rings continuously by pressing a lever and is operated by a system of strings which when run down are wound by turning the upper half of the gong. This can be done while riding. A new tire bell is also in the market. Pulling a cord brings a wheel in the bell in contact with the front tire and the bell rings continuously until the pressure is removed. Another device is a nickle-plated cannon placed in front of the fork, which emits an ear-splitting squawk when a cord is pulled.

The question of using cycles in the service of the fire brigade has frequently been raised, but little progress has been made in England. Cycling fire extinguishers are, however, used a good deal on the Continent. Milan has cycles fitted with a hand pump and about eight feet of leather hose which is fitted inside the frame of the machine. Another useful idea, which is used at Amsterdam, is a tricycle with a lifeline worked with a sort of pistol, after the fashion of the coast guard's rocket apparatus. This life-saving apparatus reaches the scene of the fire sooner than the ordinary fire escape.

On the police force of several of our large cities bicycles are used instead of horses. Especially in the park systems is this innovation found useful as an officer can rush quickly to the scene of an accident or any disturbance that happens far away from him; in a crowded city street however, the bicycle is scarcely a proper adjunct to a policeman.

It is only a few months now since I wrote of the automobile in its different forms, and predicted that within a year we should see them in quite common use. I scarcely expected, however, they would be so speedily taken into favor in our large cities. In Boston, New York, Chicago and other great cities they have become too common to excite even a passing comment. There are auto-cab companies that run automobile cabs the same as herdics and ordinary cabs are run for a dollar an hour. When the electric cab first appeared everybody turned in their carseat or stopped on the street corner to gaze at them—often to the embarrassment of those who had been bold enough to patronize them. But that period quickly passed and today the rider in an automobile cab attracts no more attention than one in an

It is predicted by some that the popularity of the automobile will soon pass and that in a couple of years they will be used only for trucking purposes. It will be curious to see whether this is true. The auto-carriage costs more than a horse and wagon at the outset but it is so much less expensive to keep, that where economy is to be considered there is little doubt that it will very soon entirely displace the horse as a working force in the large cities, but for pleasure driving, it is not likely that any combination of electricity and "doughnut wheels" will replace the noble and faithful equine friend of man. Besides, the auto. that "woman can drive" has not yet been built, and that is a consideration.

There are still some who claim that the automobile will replace the bicycle, but this is rank nonsense. I should not want to say the discoveries attendant upon its development may not lead to some new modifications of the wheel, but as for replacing it,—never! Those who have become attached to their bicycles—and there are several millions of bicycle riders—will not easily give up the pleasure of skimming along the country like a bird—or a scorcher!—for the more doubtful delight of riding in the cumbersome, ill-smelling automobile. For so long as the machinery is so complex and unweildy as now, both adjectives are appropriate. And the bicycle is safe.

It is estimated that there have been over a million bicycles sold this year alone, and in spite of the fact that fashionable ladies have rather lost their interest in them, bicycles are being ridden more by the fair sex than ever. In fact women have come to find so much of health and strength by riding the wheel that it will be long before they give up the bicycle—never, indeed, until something is invented that will be a great improvement over them.

Just what this will be is not yet revealed. A perfect means of locomotion would be the flying machine, so perfected that it would not be cumbrous or noisy, and probably somebody will yet succeed in attaching wings to a bicycle so that it will skim over the ground like a bird. Several inventors, indeed, have attempted this and failed. One man in Boston got up a wheel by which he could ride out upon the water and thought he would be able to supersede the pleasure boat. But alas! he was drowned on it, almost the first time he ventured out. Just as the Frenchman's horse at the moment when his master had accustomed him to live without eating, "up and died."

But somebody will arise yet, not only to perfect the flying-machine so that it will distance the automobile, but to make the bicycle king of them all, and more than ever a "thing of beauty and a joy forever."

A CURE FOR ASTHMA.

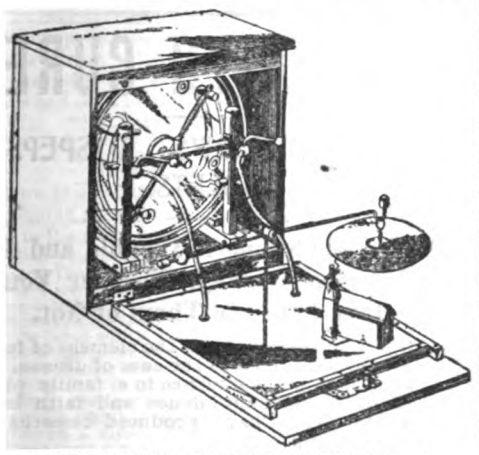
RECENT PATENTS.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

EACH month Uncle Sam grants about sixteen hundred patents to ingenious persons who have new ideas to offer, and in the collection there are always a number of very interesting suggestions, mechanical and otherwise. Naturally, a good many of the inventions thus placed on record are somewhat nonsensical, but even these cannot well be altogether absurd, inasmuch as a contrivance must at all events seem to be useful and practical before the examiners will accept it, with guarantee of exclusive rights to the originator. Indeed, the Patent Office may be said to be custodian of the record of the progress of the age, and its archives are illuminated by the creative thoughts of each succeeding generation.



One of the notable inventions recently was a process for manufacturing artificial fur, devised by George R. Sheville, of New York City. The idea of it is to produce at small cost a material closely resembling animal fur, with a backing of woven cloth, and this is accomplished in a very simple way—namely, by placing a loose mass of animal hair, or down, close up against the mechanism that forms the web of the cloth, so that into each loop of the fabric a small quantity of hair or downy filaments is taken. The thread that weaves the cloth works through the hair or down, so that the latter is incorporated with the resulting textile. Then the cloth is shrunk, so as to bind the filaments tightly in its meshes, and the final product is an exquisite fur-like stuff, which may be fur of eiderdown, fur of lambs' wool, or fur of what one pleases, the process furnishing at a cheap rate exquisite materials for garments or what not.

ARTIFICIAL FUR.

An inventor named West Dodd, of Des Moines, Iowa, has patented an apparatus for imitating thunder and lightning with real electricity. It is portable, and, when opened out by throwing down the front of its leather case, it reveals a miniature landscape, in which the principal feature is a small wooden church. Above the sacred edifice hangs an ominous artificial cloud, in the shape of a disc of zinc, and this is connected by a wire with an electric generator which occupies the body of the leather case. When a crank is turned, the destructive fluid is discharged from the zinc cloud upon the church, and would rip the latter to pieces, were it not protected by a lightning-rod. When the rod is disconnected, damage results. As the reader will already have surmised, this contrivance is intended to be carried about by lightning rod agents, who by its help will be enabled to bring conviction to the mind of the most reluctant customer.

Women have a great deal of trouble in drying their hair, when they wash it, and those who possess luxuriant tresses occasionally threaten to cut them off on this account. It is one of the reasons why the average man is not ambitious to be a woman; but this feeling may be done away with by a patent hair dryer just devised by John W. Hillerman, of Lyons, Kas. It consists of a sort of metal box, into which the lady inserts her head, while she sits in a chair for the purpose. The box is elevated on a stand behind her, and she reclines in an easy pose while subjecting her hair to the drying influence of a sort of stove concealed in the apparatus and heated by an oil lamp. Persons of the gentler sex who hang their "glory" on the gas fixture when retiring will have little use for this mode of procedure.

Strength of the fingers and long reach between thumb and little finger are greatly desired by learners on the piano, and these desiderata are aimed at by two new inventions. One of them is a socalled "hand extender," patented by Frederick L. Crane, of Malden, Mass. It consists of a screw about a foot in length, on which are fixed two loops, one to hold the little finger and the other for the thumb. By turning the screw, the distance between thumb and little finger is increased, and the process, often repeated, stretches the hand, so as to render it capable of covering more keys. As an adjunct to this apparatus may be employed the finger strengthening machine invented by Walter Bowney, of Utica, N. Y. It consists, mainly, of a sort of inclined plane, on which one rests the arm, while the fingers, inserted in loops at the ends of four elastic cords, are worked up and down and thus exercised by overcoming the resistance of the india-rubber.

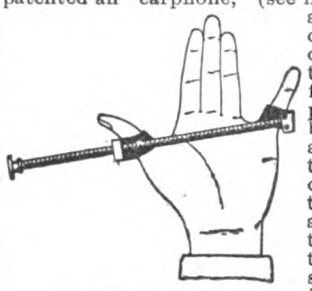
Mosquito canopies are always a bore, and the thanks of a grateful public will go out to Thomas J. Powers, of Steubenville, O., who has contrived a wire apparatus of this sort for bedsteads, which when one is ready to seek repose in the arms of Morpheus, folds down and encloses one in a mosquito-proof box. There is no trouble about mosquitoes crawling up underneath the bar, or making their way through meshes that happen to be extra large. The apparatus is warranted to keep them out absolutely, so that the sleeper may compose himself regardless of the midnight song, and in the morning he has simply to unfold the apparatus by a jerk or two and step forth.

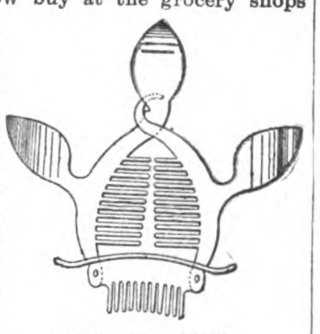
For country fairs particularly is designed a new style of popcorn popper, invented by Solomon C. Brinserr, of Middletown, Pa. It will pop several bushels of the grain at once, without burning so much as a kernel, a special contrivance keeping the corn agitated. Power is furnished by a belt, and the whole affair is said to be very inexpensive.



FINGER STRENGTHENER.

For farmers' use is a novel contrivance in the way of an egg tester, which is a box having a mirror for its bottom and two oval holes in its top for eggs to be placed in. The reflected light thrown upward by the glass causes the eggs to appear clearly translucent if they are fresh, while, if otherwise, they will be more or less opaque. This, it should be explained, is the invention of Carl H. Anderson, of Kenosha, Wis.

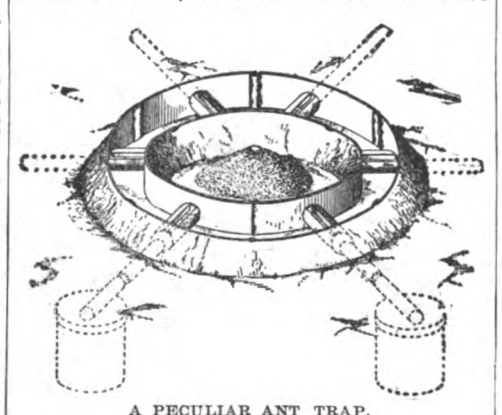
Nowadays people live so fast that they have hardly time to die, much less to be buried, and therefore a boon is bestowed by the invention of James Paugh, of La Grange, Ky., which has for its object the filling of graves and the making of neat mounds over them by machine. No sooner is the defunct safely lowered than the hole in the ground is filled in, and the mortuary decencies are made complete, without a minute's annoying delay. This device is supplemented by what is termed an "imitation gravestone," originated by Hugh Campbell of Manchester, N. H. It looks like marble, but in reality is a shell of iron, so as to be comparatively cheap. If desired, a photograph of the dear departed may be inserted in a frame in the front, just below the inscription.



Frank H. Collins, of Everett, Mass., has just patented an "earphone," (see initial) which is an application of the principle of the telephone to a contrivance for helping deaf people. A small battery and coil are carried in the breast pocket of the coat, and the transmitter attached thereto is hitched to the lapel of the same garment, just like an eyeglass. When the deaf man desires to listen to anybody's conversation, he simply hands the transmitter to the person and gives his attention, a supplementary pair of wires connecting the battery with a little instrument which hangs over the rim of the ear and enters its orifice. Recently, by the way, a man named Henderson has made a discovery which seems likely to prove a remedy even for total deafness, a telephonic system being employed. He got his suggestion from the use by telephone girls of apparatus fixed to their heads.

HAND STRETCHER.

The woes of the women who cannot keep their back hair together have inspired an invention of which Robert F. Tochtermann, of London, is the author. He has newly patented the device in this country. It is a very complicated comb, which holds up the coil, retains the shorter hairs of the neck, and performs other offices of the same kind, so that no lady provided with one of these ornamental appliances need feel nervous lest the loss of a switch, the exposure of a rat, or the coming undone of an accidental curl cause her embarrassment. In a word, her coiffure, thus protected, will never come to look like a last year's bird's nest—which reminds one of a novel style of hen's nest patented by Arthur D. Worley, of Iron Hill, Md., whose contrivance closes the entrance to Biddy's bed when she is "on," thus keeping other hens from intruding or laying eggs beneath her when she is setting.



Machines have been made recently for cracking nuts with such ease and accuracy that anybody may now buy at the grocery shops pecans and other nuts, ready shelled, at about the same price per pound of kernels as is charged for the kernels contained in the unshelled article. One of these machines was patented recently by Julian Prade, of Waco, Texas—the great pecan growing State.

A USEFUL COMB.

Nathan O. Bond, of Hyannis, Mass., has invented an automatic egg boiler, which, by the aid of a spring catch adjusted in connection with a clockwork mechanism, pulls the eggs out of the water when they are cooked. Within a comparatively short time butter packages, somewhat similar in idea to the familiar pasteboard egg crates, have come into use, and the latest of these is the idea of John W. Barnes, of Mt. Gilead, Ohio. The butter crate is made up of a series of pasteboard compartments, each holding exactly one pound. Thus there is no lumping of the product in transit, and on its arrival at the market, it is in condition to be sold without cutting, each pound piece being done up neatly in a piece of cheesecloth.

Lastly, among the inventions of the month just passed, may be mentioned a peculiar ant trap contrived by Bogan B. Cash, of Wayland, Tex. Everybody, and particularly every housewife, knows how annoying ants sometimes make themselves, and hence the interest attaching to this peculiar form of snare. As shown in the picture, it is placed so as to encircle an anthill, the owners of which are to be destroyed. The insects are led by tubes, in the manner indicated in the drawing, from the nest into tin cans sunk in the ground, which are partly filled with kerosene, and in this manner they are wiped out wholesale.

$2,000 PAINTING FOR 10 CTS.

A Beautiful Reproduction in ALL the Colors of the Original

THE PICTURE.

Last spring we purchased for $2,000.00 the noted oil painting entitled "Unexpected Trouble," or "The First Swim," by Fred Morgan, Esq., of the British Royal Academy. The size of the original canvas is 31 1-2 by 42 1-2 inches. A corps of artists have prepared a reproduction of this noted work in exact imitation of the original, every color and shade of color being faithfully reproduced. As a result, we can offer an exact reproduction of this noted painting in a size 19 by 25 inches, printed on heavy coated paper. A great many cheap reproductions of works of art have been scattered over the country. This, however, is not of this character. In addition to the original outlay we have incurred an immense expense in securing this reproduction, and we have no hesitation whatever, in recommending it most highly.

THE THEME.

In the foreground is an old hen greatly excited because she cannot swim after her foster brood of ducklings. Gleefully watching the predicament of the hen is a little child held up by a doting grandmother. The whole picture is full of life, and appeals to every one at first sight.

"Unexpected Trouble."

The Wonderful $2,000 Oil Painting by the Noted English Artist, Fred Morgan.

THE ARTIST.

The original painting is by the eminent English painter, Mr. Fred Morgan, who is considered the most perfect delineator of children now living.

MONTROSE VILLA,
ST. BONIFACE ROAD,
VENTNOR, Aug. 16, '98.

"It is a most admirable copy of my original, quite one of the most satisfactory reproductions I have ever had, giving the exact drawing and color, and almost the touches of the brush. In some senses too faithful, as it brings to my memory the difficulties of getting the baby boy to pose, and the worry of the ducklings.

"The incident was years ago, when I was a child in Aylesbury, Buckinghamshire, justly celebrated for its ducks and butter. I used to see the henwife bring the young ducks as soon as hatched and toss them into the farm pond, and as the scene interested me then I thought it worth reproducing.

"The greater part of my life has been passed in the country, and all of my pictures are of domestic scenes in the open air.

"Yours faithfully,
"FRED MORGAN."

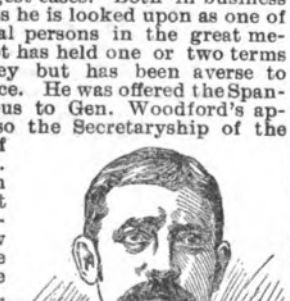
AFFAIRS IN OUR COLONIES.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

AS the rainy season is at its height in the Philippines, there has been but little action on the part of our soldiers for the past month, but still once in a while the Filipino insurgents make an outbreak and compel a short fight, which invariably results in their retreat leaving a number of dead behind them. Generally these attacks have been on small garrison towns where our soldiers are encamped and are in the nature of surprises. Even if successful, these movements would serve for nothing excepting possibly to encourage the natives and possibly give the insurgents some much needed supplies. Fighting excepting in a guerilla style in the jungle is out of the question at this season.

Notwithstanding this comparative quiet and practical cessation of active hostilities, many events have transpired in the past month of more or less importance and interest in connection with our present foreign policy, which will be read with interest by the readers of COMFORT, who have signified so much pleasure in these brief articles which have appeared regularly since the commencement of our war with Spain.

The most noticeable act of the past month was the resignation of Gen. Russell A. Alger, as Secretary of War. When Gen. Alger was appointed to the cabinet position which he has occupied, the thought of a foreign war was not in any mind. It will be remembered that he was a soldier of the Civil war and had risen to a commanding position. After leaving the army he became one of the lumber kings of the northwest and from his home in Detroit, Mich. entered into many successful business enterprises. He has served as governor and was a strong candidate for the Republican nomination for the Presidency in two national conventions. In Detroit he is known as a very able and very philanthropic man.



GEN. RUSSELL A. ALGER.

Whatever may have been the cause, the war department was found full of incompetency, when actual hostilities broke out, and many scandals of greater or less magnitude were printed by the newspapers in exaggerated form. While by no means an excitable people, Americans are fond of sensations; and overlooking the wonderful fact of a totally unprepared country rushed into a needless war and successfully putting an army of 300,000 fully equipped and drilled men into the field in less than three months, they magnified the shortcomings. In such cases the blame naturally falls on the head officer, and Gen. Alger, in spite of his great successes and his exertions has been singled out as the cause for all disaster. As a consequence his position in the popular estimation has been that of an incompetent and weak man stubbornly holding to a place for which he was incompetent. Undoubtedly this has been much exaggerated and that the sins of others have been laid to him; that he has been the "scapegoat," but it is impossible that his resignation should not be a relief to the administration, on which he had become a serious load, as well as to the people generally, who had come to blame him personally for each and every fault of army administration.

The press quite generally through the country had loudly demanded Alger's resignation. So there was no great surprise after many reports and denials of his intention to resign, when it was ascertained that he had gone to the coast of New Jersey to consult with the Vice President concerning the matter. Many stories have been told as to what took place upon his return to Washington. The current belief is that he asked the President to make a public statement that his administration had been satisfactory, and upon a refusal he had tendered his resignation to take effect at the President's pleasure. One thing that recently added to the strained relation was an alliance in Michigan politics between Gov. Pingree, an avowed enemy of President McKinley, and the war secretary for the purpose of electing the United States senator to succeed McMillan.

This resignation which was immediately accepted to take effect August 1, caused quite a general call that the place be given to Governor Roosevelt of New York, as a man capable of reforming the war bureau; but the President selected for the high honor Elihu Root of New York City and the appointment met with general approval by all but the "yellow" papers, which are pleased with nothing.

Secretary Root was born in 1845, and is the son of a then professor of mathematics in Hamilton college. He is one of the most celebrated lawyers of the American bar and has appeared in some of the largest cases. Both in business and social interests he is looked upon as one of the most influential persons in the great metropolis. Mr. Root has held one or two terms as district attorney but has been averse to holding public office. He was offered the Spanish mission previous to Gen. Woodford's appointment and also the Secretaryship of the Interior, both of which he declined. It was only on great pressure that he consented to accept what is now considered the most responsible seat in the Cabinet. Secretary Root is an enthusiastic outdoor sportsman and is noted for extreme affability in manner and address. As many difficult legal problems will confront the administration in the government of our colonies, and as they come under the direction of the Secretary of War until Congress shall decide otherwise, it is believed the right man is now in the right place.

SECRETARY ELIHU ROOT.

Much interest attaches itself to the career of Joseph Wheeler, the noted Confederate general who left his seat in Congress to join the army in Cuba, and who was appointed a General of cavalry by President McKinley. The return of the soldiers from Cuba brought his military services to a close for the time being; but with the increase of the volunteer army now going on, his services came into immediate requisition and to the general delight of the country he was given orders to report for active duty to Gen. Otis at Manila. He left immediately for San Francisco from whence he sailed for the seat of war by first steamer. Wherever he may go we may be sure to hear of good, hard fighting.

Before sailing he gave utterance to a public statement which has commanded the highest attention, partly from the fact that it accords with the general sentiment, but more from the prominent position he holds as a former confederate leader and a politician whose party is opposed to the present administration. In his statement General Wheeler said that he was gratified to find that the sentiment here was apparently unanimous of sustaining the course of the administration in the Philippines.

In the East, he said, there was a small faction opposed to the government and work of its writers and speakers had undoubtedly prolonged the war. Although these people are few in numbers, they are capable of much mischief. In fact, Aguinaldo has already, in an address to his followers, made capital to this apparent discontent with the conduct of the campaign.

"This is a people's war," added the general, "more a people's war than any other in the history of this country. The people are behind the president and want the contest carried to its logical conclusion. I hope for active service in the Philippines, but have not yet been assigned to any particular duty. My orders are simply to report to Major-General Otis at Manila."

As many of the volunteer regiments are now returning to the Pacific coast and are received with great enthusiasm, it is, perhaps, the proper place to call notice to the attention which is being paid General Otis by the newspaper press. The returning soldiers are full of criticism as to his methods, claiming that he fights, wins, and then gives up; and that under such leadership it will take 20 years to capture the islands. These and many other criticisms have been made. Unfortunately for him just as the air was full of these criticisms several reputable correspondents of the largest papers signed a "round robin" charging him with suppression and falsification of news and of a general plan to deceive our people as to the real condition. This was telegraphed from Hong Kong. Its publication caused a half panic which quickly subsided but has left the people in a state of anxiety, while part of the press calls for another general and more decisive measure.

The returning soldiers praise Gen. Lawton without stint and it is believed that should a change become necessary either Gen. Miles will assume charge or Lawton will be appointed to the Philippine command. Many feel that Gen. Otis could be made Governor of the Islands; and that Lawton could have a successful military command without harm to Otis' reputation. The successful military career of Gen. Lawton is so well known by the public that we refrain from repeating it here.

GENERAL LAWTON.

The country is taking the deepest interest in the new regiments of volunteers now being formed to take the place of the returning soldiers and to reinforce Gen. Otis.

These regiments are raised at various recruiting points and organized at some of the larger camps. They do not have state names but the regimental numbers follow those of the regiments of the old regular army in consecutive order. The officers for these regiments are taken by the President from those that have seen service and whose records entitle them to the distinction. The criticism thrown at young officers in the Spanish war of appointment solely as a political favor cannot exist. Commissions are dealt out only to those apparently worthy and the surprises show that they seem to be given strictly on merit. The higher officers will be detailed from the old regiments of the regular army to considerable extent.

For many years there have been efforts made to induce our American government to connect the continent with Hawaii, but Congress has never been ready to appropriate sufficient money for the purpose. The developments of our Spanish war, The Samoan rebellion and other matters have shown the necessity of quicker communication between the islands of the Southern Pacific ocean and other civilized lands; so that the British government has taken measures to push forward the great enterprise of laying the first long cable in the Pacific.

The survey steamer Egeria arrived in Esquimault, B. C., in the earlier part of July having completed her work of surveying and sounding for the proposed cable. The English and Canadian governments working together will lay this wire from British Columbia to Australia, touching on the way both the Hawaiian and Samoan groups. It was felt to be desirable to take a few more soundings; accordingly the steamer soon left on an outward trip to Honolulu and Apia, from thence to sound to the nearest safe point in Australia. The final survey having been taken the work of laying the cable itself will be rushed forward. While it would be better to have this wire under our own government, the situation, with quick communication established, will be vastly improved.

The commission returning from Samoa shows that everything has worked harmoniously there. The three nations involved have agreed to abolish a native kingship and it is probable that there will be a native government, carried on under the direction of a commission or governor, not a native. It is hoped that future rebellions have been prevented and that a stable government will be established. Recognizing America as a power with great interests in the Pacific, both the British and German governments seem anxious for us to assume the control of the Samoan group, practically leaving them to us; but so far as it appears the general sentiment of the press is not in favor of further acquisitions until we have Americanized what territory has come to us during the past year. A thing which had not been previously thought of now appears in the announcement that it is found that the cession of the Philippine Islands brings to the general government as spoils some 35,000,000 acres of public land largely inhabited, but fertile and often desirable. There will have to be a homestead scheme to mee tthe conditions as the standing laws are not applicable. To encourage colonization the usual period of five years actual cultivation now necessary to ownership may be reduced to three or even two years. It is hoped that negro emigration may follow and secure the happiness of a large number of black men now in our southern states. It is thought the negro's knowledge of advanced modern agriculture will largely assist in lifting up the Malay agriculturalists.

The convention at The Hague which was called at the instance of the Czar of Russia for consideration of the Czar's suggestion that increase of military forces in any nation should now stop and gradual disarmament commence, has at length dissolved. The convention has been a very successful one and has been instructive to the world in showing the advanced attitude of modern civilization towards the matters concerning universal peace. Of course actual disarmament is at present impossible, but the work of this world's convention which has been signed by all the powers in the convention has placed arbitration of quarrels very much to the front. A permanent tribunal has been suggested and agreed to by which, without intervening, the powers will offer friendly services and mediate quarrels before the two contending nations shall resort finally to arms.

Many additional matters were brought up relative to the safety to individual property when on the high seas in time of war; the workings of the Geneva Red Cross, and many other things which have been taught by civilization and are in the line of progress and enlightenment.

Many of our readers have seen notices of the advanced position of England and America which has brought very much criticism upon them by the press of other nations relative to the refusal of either of these nations to be in any way bound by a decree which was sought to be established by this convention, concerning the suppression of further warlike inventions, and especially of the dum-dum bullet. Regarding this latter there has been the widest criticism and charges of barbarism and lack of progress against these two great nations.

The position taken by our delegates in this great congress as well as those representing Great Britain was that they would in no way restrict the invention of more warlike articles, holding to the ground that war should be made so terrible that nations would not only hesitate but almost refuse to enter into it, and that the more dangerous and destructive weapons were produced by the inventive genius of either country, so much the surer was that country to remain at peace with all the world. This broad view is mostly contended against and seemed particularly distasteful to the less inventive nations that were represented. The reproach which was endeavored to be placed on these countries, especially regarding the dum-dum bullet, is explained from the fact that all the civilized nations are against explosive bullets. The tendency of modern small arms has been to make a bullet which would be small and destructive, and when striking the victim if it did not at once kill him would cause but a small wound which would easily heal. The dum-dum bullet, on the contrary, is made of soft lead and covered with copper or nickel partly. It is of such peculiar make up that when it strikes it spreads and makes a very severe and shattering wound breaking whatever bones it reaches badly and lacerating the flesh itself. It is one of the most barbarous inventions of modern times, but is defended by these very advanced countries on the idea that they both have large colonial possessions and must constantly be at war with barbarous or semi-barbarous tribes, and that all rules of ordinary civilized warfare are lost on these people who would not be bound by the rules of civilized warfare or submit to them, and that more brutal force is needed in subduing them; so that in fighting such tribes, civilized countries must be armed in the most destructive manner in order to make whatever lesson is administered unnecessary of repetition in the future.

The Olympia, bearing Admiral Dewey homeward, is at this writing in the Mediterranean Sea. At the several places at which he has stopped Admiral Dewey has been received with most enthusiastic demonstrations of good will both to himself and to his nation. This action on the part of European citizens is highly pleasing to Americans who appreciate the attention shown to our great naval hero. It is now understood that on his arrival in America, which will be near the first of October, the North American squadron under Admiral Sampson is to meet the Olympia at some designated point and escort her to New York.

Here a demonstration will take place which in extent and magnificence will be unrivalled in any modern event of similar nature, with the possible exception of the great days of the Queen's jubilee in London a few years ago. Immense preparations for the demonstration are already under way, and a temporary triumphal arch costing $50,000 is one of the features. This is to be replaced later by a permanent arch of the same formation which will cost hundreds of thousands of dollars, the work of which is to be given by Italian sculptors without cost. The display of electrical illumination on the great occasion will be the most wonderful thing ever seen. Brooklyn bridge is to be converted into a complete mass of electrical light to be shown every evening; while it is expected every pier and warehouse will be covered with similar lights for the greatest night of the celebration. Readers who have ever seen New York at night from either river with its wonderful display of tall buildings lighted by electricity and the myriads of colored lights from the water's edge and upon the bosoms of the two rivers, may form some idea of the grand spectacle which will be given in this display. Aside from this there are to be parades and decorations without number.

After the New York display, Admiral Dewey is to go to Washington to be entertained by the president and heads of departments. There will be a repetition of the New York display on a lesser scale. Here the Admiral will be presented with the $10,000 sword appropriated by Congress in honor of him and his victory in Manila Bay. The sword and its elaborate scabbard were made by Tiffany at a cost of over $3,000. The balance of the appropriation is to be devoted to medals for himself, officers and men, all of which will be distributed at that time.

NO FAITH CURE

ABOUT STUART'S DYSPEPSIA TABLETS.

They Cure Stomach Trouble and Indigestion Anyway, Whether You Have Faith in Them or Not.

All physicians agree that the element of faith has a great deal to do in the cure of disease.

Firm belief and confidence in a family physician of the same confidence and faith in a patent medicine have produced remarkable cures in all ages.

This is especially true in nervous troubles, and no field offers so prolific a harvest for the quack and charlatan as the diseases arising from a weak or run down nervous system.

Nevertheless, the most common of all diseases, indigestion and stomach troubles which in turn cause nervous disease, heart troubles, consumption and loss of flesh, requires something besides faith to cure.

Mere faith will not digest your food for you, will not give you an appetite, will not increase your flesh and strengthen your nerves and heart, but Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets will do these things, because they are composed of the elements of digestion, they contain the juices, acids and peptones necessary to the digestion and assimilation of all wholesome food.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets will digest food if placed in a jar or bottle in water heated to 98 degrees, and they will do it much more effectively when taken into the stomach after meals, whether you have faith that they will or not.

They invigorate the stomach, make pure blood and strong nerves in the only way that nature can do it, and that is from plenty of wholesome food, well digested. It is not what we eat, but what we digest that does us good.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are sold by druggists at 50 cents for full sized package.

"September strews the woodland o'er
With many a brilliant color;
The world is brighter than before,
Why should our hearts be duller?
Sorrow and the scarlet leaf,
Sad thoughts and sunny weather!
Ah me! this glory and this grief
Agree not well together."

DEAR NIECES AND NEPHEWS:

Thus Nature never repines over the loss of bee and bird and flower. She goes steadily on with her appointed task. Each day has its work, and no matter how much is taken from her she does her best with what remains. Though all bright flowers and all sweet songs are forsaking her she clothes herself in gaily colored leaves and never falters in her useful toil. So let us, as friends depart and losses come, show to others a bright face, and go calmly on doing our part in this world's work, remembering that trials are not sent us to brood over, but to lift us up, to broaden and deepen our characters, and so, if we will only let them, to enable us the sooner to do the work for which we were placed here and to fit us for the life to come.

"Not enjoyment, and not sorrow,
Is our destined end or way;
But to act, that each to-morrow
Finds us farther than to-day."

Now to our letters, the first one of which holds us still in the departing summer for one more ramble in the piney woods.

"Did you ever take a horseback ride all alone among the pines of southern Georgia? If not you have missed one of life's weird, mystic poems that breathes in its solemn grandeur a sublimity just the reverse of the ocean's wild roar. For miles and miles level white roads bordered with green verdure wind through the forest, which is scattered over in spring with thousands of starry-eyed phlox blooms of every conceivable color. Shining through the trees here and there is a spreading brooklet which in the low country widens until it becomes a clear, still lake, through which your horse tramps very leisurely, and in summer, like an experienced toper, insists on taking a drink.

AMONG THE GEORGIA PINES.

"While listening to the dreamy minor notes of the waving pines one's revery suddenly comes to an end by the glimpse of a dark, lazy alligator stretched full length on the trunk of an ancient cypress that has fallen in the miniature lake. Just to try his agility hurl a stick in that direction, and glancing toward you as if he considers you very presumptuous, he slowly turns, and, without any rash haste, deliberately lets himself down into the water and crawls into his subterranean apartments.

"A little farther on we join a party en route to the beautiful Ocmulgee to take a peep into our fish baskets. Mirabile dictu! There safely ensconced in the base of the conical trap we find a large cat fish weighing twenty-five pounds! Having been reared in middle Georgia, it was the first time I had ever seen such a monster. Around him were several smaller ones, which to us were immense, but this aquatic king, what shall we do with him? Finally we decided to bake his majesty, but when the cook prepared him for the roaster, his dimensions forbade his entrance and he had to be quartered.

"The lofty pine, however, is not alone in his glory on the river. There we see majestic oaks draped most gracefully in long sweeping moss, the mourning cypress waves in the soft summer air and the tall Magnolia Grandiflora with its white queenly blooms waft their fragrance everywhere.

"But the greatest fun to me was hunting the wild turkey and the quail in their woodland haunts. There were a dozen in the party, all on horseback, except two girls who were mounted on mules and quite delighted with the novelty. The gentlemen cautiously proceeded through dense woods in search of the turkey, while we were acting sentinels on the movements of the quail. A signal was to be given when a drove of birds came in sight. They did not have to wait long. The echo of the little whistle was caught on the breeze. All were wild with excitement and highly elated at the prospect of securing the whole drove and enjoying a partridge dinner—but alas! It is said a woman can never hold her tongue at the right moment, so we thoughtless creatures chatted and giggled in spite of all the warnings of our gallant escorts and—so we lost our game! Instead of meekly being driven into the nets the frightened birds suddenly left us and all of our glorious visions of quail on toast for that day were like a mirage of the desert. The gentlemen, however, were too chivalrous to blame us very severely, but secretly decided among themselves never to go quail hunting in partnership with our sex again, wisely quoting 'speech is silver but silence is golden.' Thanks to their superior control of the tongue, we were made happy in a few days by a long net containing thirty encaged quails, half a deer and a wild turkey."

LOUISE ROGERS, Barnesville, Ga.

From the wild freedom of the Georgia pines to the dreary fastnesses of a Kentucky penitentiary is a great and sudden change, and yet perhaps it will be good for us to reflect a little in view of our coming festival, on our blessings and comforts, and to realize how many there are in this broad land to whom Thanksgiving day is almost the only taste they have of enjoyment of any kind.

"Thanksgiving day, the day that is looked forward to with so much pleasure and happiness by the many thousands of inhabitants of our dear land, brings no less joy to those confined in our State penitentiaries. They are thankful that it is as well with them as it is, which many of us are not. It has been our pleasure to witness expressions of gladness and thankfulness light up the faces of men who had transgressed the law and were paying the penalty, that are seldom seen on the outside.

"On ordinary days when visitors wish to go through the penitentiary they have to pay twenty-five cents admission, which from the great numbers who visit the prison makes quite a snug sum annually. This fund is set apart to provide extras for the inmates of the prison on Thanksgiving, Christmas and Fourth of July.

"Some weeks before the day set for Thanksgiving the officer having such matters in charge purchases a large number of turkeys and geese, and these are well fed to get them in prime condition for the day of feasting and rejoicing, while great quantities of cakes, apples, lemons, pies, and other things, are purchased and prepared for the day of days to those men.

"The day before Thanksgiving the turkeys and geese are dressed, and long before daybreak on Thanksgiving day experienced cooks are at work preparing them for dinner. The great ovens and ranges are kept busy until near the noon hour, when the work is completed. When the 'all-right' bell rings at 6.30 a. m. on this day, the men do not march to the work shops as usual but are given the liberty of the yard and are permitted to engage in conversation or games, to read, write, or attend services in the chapel conducted by earnest Christian men and women who visit the prison in large numbers on such days. Soon the bell that they are so eagerly listening for calls them into line and the march into the dining room for Thanksgiving dinner begins. In a few moments all are seated in their accustomed places, the kind-hearted warden and chaplain each speak a few well chosen words, and the bell taps for, to them, the greatest of all dinners to commence. Neat and swift waiters flit here and there attending to the wants of all, and doubtless the dinner is more thoroughly enjoyed and thankfully received than in many homes where happiness and thankfulness should reign supreme.

"If you want to enjoy one Thanksgiving spend it among your fallen fellowmen and also try to make some poor unfortunate realize that even in this day and time it can be said of some, 'I was in prison and ye visited me.'"

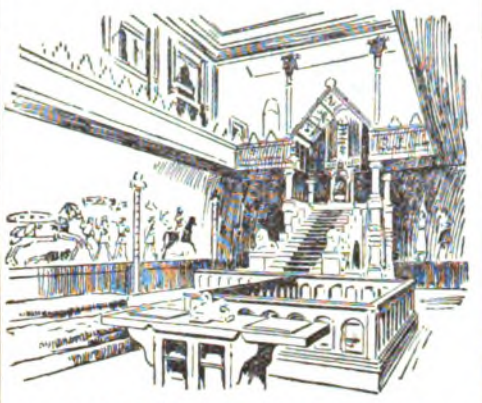
J. W. COLE, Benton, Ky.

Here is a very pleasant letter from an Oregon cousin.

"I have been reading the letters of others in COMFORT and think I will write you a few lines about my home.

"We live on a ranch on the east side of Columbia River, and are surrounded by mountains. Our ranch contains one hundred and sixty-seven acres of timber land and five or six acres of farming land. The O. R. and N. railway runs just in front of the house. There is a mountain near by called Shell Rock, around which this railway runs. This mountain is well named Shell Rock for pieces of it are constantly breaking off and falling into the Columbia River or on the railway track. The managers of the railway are obliged to keep a watchman on duty day and night at this point to keep the track clear of rocks.

"There are also many creeks or brooks that run down from the mountains, which are noted for their trout which measure from five to nine and ten inches in length. People are not allowed to catch trout less than five inches long this year, which will be rather hard on the fishermen who make a living by catching brook trout."



LAURA M. STOKOE, Cascade Locks, Ore.

One of the most curious as well as instructive buildings of modern times is that of the "Halls of the Ancients," so called, in Washington, D. C. Its originator and architect, whose name appears in the following letter, was also the designer and builder of the Pompeiian house at Saratoga Springs, which was so graphically described in this department a year or two ago by Robert Seaver.

"The fact that each state of our Union has its own capital should not cause us to forget that we have a National capital as well. The city of Washington may well command our admiration and love; it should be our Mecca, the spot which every citizen should aim to visit and know. That such educational institutions as are of value to all should find their home in this, our City Beautiful, seems most appropriate. The construction of the National Galleries, the greatest educational conception ever presented to the world, will be a realization of the ideal museum, illustrating the evolution of civilization so that all can study and understand.

"Mr. Franklin W. Smith is the promotor of this broad and nationalizing idea. To teach the people the need of it, he has constructed on New York Avenue, the building which he calls 'The Halls of the Ancients.' One large room in this building is devoted exclusively to models and plans of the proposed structure. The remainder is arranged to furnish, in a most fascinating manner, illustrations of the four great civilizations on whose ashes our own has been built.

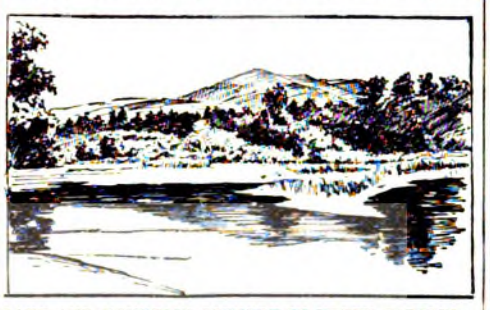
"A reconstruction of the Columns of Karnak, those wonderful supporting shafts, the highest ever raised by man, guards the entrance to the building and leads into the Hall of Columns. Here are seen the twelve, glorious in the Oriental coloring and decorations, with their capitals in Lotus Bud and Palm, while graphic tales of life and death and conquest may be read in the hieroglyphics that are traced on wall and column. Roman civilization is illustrated in the House of Vettius, covering with its different rooms, ten thousand square feet. The Throne Room, an Assyrian apartment, appears in its heavenly splendor of blue and gold, Assyria's chosen colors. A model of King Senacherib is seated on the Throne of Xerxes while captives of different races support the chair. The Saracenic

THRONE ROOM, HALLS OF THE ANCIENTS.

Hall, with its gallery covered with casts of tracories from the Alhambra, is wonderfully beautiful.

"As we pass from room to room the past seems linked to the present. We see before us the architecture, the coloring, the illustration of the arts and religion, even the daily life of the ancient peoples. It is something more than a museum of mummies and relics, it is a 'house full of ideas' not of 'dead men's bones.'"

ELLA S. COOPER, Bridgeport, Conn.



Since the Cuban War anything pertaining to the West Indies possesses a peculiar interest to our people, so I am sure the following letter describing the Lake of Fire at Nassau will please my readers.

"Among the many attractions of Nassau in the Bahamas, is a small lake called the 'Lake of Fire' which is about one thousand feet long and from two to three hundred feet broad. It was originally constructed to store green turtles in, but now is one of the great attractions for visitors. In the daytime it appears just the same as any well behaved sheet of water, but it is at night that the 'Imp of Darkness' or some other imp gets in his fireworks. The minute the water is agitated it seems like a sheet of fire. This is due to the phosphorescence of the water, though why there should be so much phosphorescence in this one particular spot has never been satisfactorily explained. The lake is cut out of solid rock and is only a few hundred feet from the ocean, with which it is connected by a small canal, and when the gate in the canal is left open the water in the lake rises and falls with the tide. Though no underground connection with the lake has yet been found, no matter how often its water is changed, the phosphorescence remains the same. To step out of the dense darkness of a tropical night and gaze on this mysterious lake gives one a very weird and gruesome sensation."

MARION JOHNSON, Cornwall, Conn.

Now we have a bit of description of North Carolina scenery written for us by a new cousin, whom we are glad to welcome among us.

"Yadkin College is situated in the horseshoe bend of the Yadkin river, in Davidson county, North Carolina. It is built on a very high hill, and has an observatory six stories high. From this observatory can be seen one of the grandest pieces of natural scenery it has ever been my privilege to behold. Just over north the grand old Pilot Mountain seems to be standing sentinel over a continuous range of mountains, from west to east as far as the eye can see; and the majestic river, like a silver belt, flashing and sparkling in the sunlight, winds its tortuous way from north to south. In plain view one can watch the different ferryboats as they ply their way to and fro across the mighty river. From every hilltop rise the palatial homes of the wealthy, and low down in the valley the hovels of the poor seem to be shrinking out of sight. As the sun reaches the meridian one hears the shrill whistle of the engines, and from three tobacco factories come pouring forth their employees, men, women and little children—on their way to their humble homes for the noon meal. Anon we hear the clang of the college bell, and the delighted children, released from temporary confinement, rush out of the college with shouts and laughter. Then come tripping girls, the dignified divinity student, and the staid professors, all wending their several ways to their homes for refreshment and rest. As one looks down from this lofty perch one can but think of the different lots in the world; but it is comforting to know that no matter what position we occupy there is 'One who heeds, who holds us all in His large love and boundless thought.'"

MRS. A. A. WATKINS. Manson, N. C.

Now we have a short sketch of the beautiful city of Peoria, Illinois.

"Not more than a century ago, the now large and thrifty city of Peoria, with thousands of inhabitants, was a lake, where Indians used to fish and paddle their canoes, this being their favorite spot for hunting and fishing. Now nothing remains to be seen of the lake but houses, houses, everywhere; old settlers can tell you of how their grandparents made peace with the Indians and built their log cabins on the lake shores. The lake gradually dried or ran out, as it was a branch of the Illinois river. At the upper side of the city the river is wide and is still called lake. High bluffs surround the entire city, forming a valley and a protection to people from storms. The scenery on the outskirts of the town is magnificent. The city has many industries giving employment to thousands of men, women, boys and girls. It is especially noted for the distilling of alcohol and whiskey and storing of grain. Many beautiful public buildings are to be seen, and it ranks next to Chicago in every respect. CHAS. HONAG, Peoria, Ills.

Here are a few words from a favorite cousin of ours.

"Hunting and fishing are the favorite sports among the residents along the Mississippi coast, and no place is more suited for this purpose than Chef Menteur, or the 'Chef' as it is familiarly called.

"The 'Chef' derives its name from the beautiful bayou of the same name which connects Lake Borgne with Lake Pontchartrain, and here fish abound at almost all seasons of the year, and as a natural result many fishing and hunting clubs have homes on the banks of this little stream, and any day zealous sportsmen may be seen in pirogues trying their luck at the fish.

"Chef Menteur is about twenty miles beyond New Orleans, and is on the Louisville and Nashville Road. Men from the city come out to the Chef on the morning trains, spend the day hunting snipe and duck or fishing, and return to the city that evening in season for dinner, and very seldom empty-handed.

"The club houses are well kept and their tables supplied with every delicacy, their nearness to New Orleans making it an easy matter to procure everything desired.

LOUELLA SPENCE, Pass Christian, Miss.

Many thanks to Salona L. Merritt for her account of the Battle of Big Hole, which I cannot use because it is compiled. We do not use historical articles here.

The following letter is very good and interesting, and is deserving of a prize, but was crowded out of my prize list.

"Now come with me and visit the oil town of Sistersville. Five years ago it was only a little steamboat landing, but now has a population of six thousand, has city water works, free mail delivery and natural gas for fuel and light. We get the gas for $.13 1-2 per thousand feet, and an ordinary family will burn about two thousand feet per month in summer and from ten to fifteen thousand feet per stove per month in winter. The oil wells and houses are all mixed up together and the oil company has the right of way in all things. Our homes are on leased ground, for which we pay from twenty to forty dollars a year lease rent, according to location. We cannot buy a lot as the natives will not sell for love or money, and all ground is leased for oil purposes and then re-leased to people to build on, and if an oil company wants to run a line of oil through your house you can either move it or they can. They will come into town and bring forty quarts of nitroglycerine and lower it in the wells in tin tubes holding any amount they desire, and then drop a piece of iron down and then run; and by the time they are a few rods away the iron has reached the glycerine and a shower of rocks, oil and smoke shoots up over the top of the derrick, which is about seventy-five feet high; but as the wells are about two thousand feet deep in this vicinity there is no danger after the glycerine is in the well. An oil well costs all the way from one to two, three or four thousand dollars, according to the depth and the luck they have in drilling it; and some of them flow as much as one thousand barrels a day. However, such wells are few and are classed as gushers. A fifty barrel well is counted a good producer, and is likely to hold out longer than one of the big wells. The Standard Oil Company has most of the oil in this field, but there are many private companies, and the owners of the ground get a royalty—one-eighth or one-sixteenth of the oil.

MRS. F. K. SHURTE, Sistersville, W. Va.

And now our time is up, so good-by until October.

September means the end of vacations to thousands of people. Schools, colleges, factories and shops call with the voice of the town. It also means the commencement of vacation to the vast army who have been catering to the needs of "summer boarders."

"Parting summer's lingering bloom" has almost claimed September for her own. The early part of September is emphatically a summer month. The habit of extending vacation into this month grows from year to year in the class that can afford to ignore the imperative call of business.

Sarah Bernhardt's rendering of Hamlet has awakened a desire to play "the melancholy Dane" on the part of Julia Arthur. Americans are promised the innovation of seeing a woman in the title part of the great tragedy. All this awakens discussions as to Hamlet's personal appearance. The mental pictures of Hamlet as given by prominent people run the gamut from "fair and fat" to "dark, small and subtle." It offers an opportunity for newspapers in search of a discussion to ask their readers: "How did Hamlet look?"

The patriotic feelings roused to expression by the war have found vent in a perfect epidemic of sword giving. The sword has ceased to be a weapon of defence but it is still symbolical and as we cannot present rapid firing guns or powder horns the sword answers every demand of sentiment and admiration. The presentation of a sword to the captain of the cruiser Baltimore on the twelfth of September is an occasion of more than ordinary interest to the American people. The fight at North Point during the war of 1812, occurred upon that date. It was during the night of that day that Francis Scott Key wrote "The Star Spangled Banner." America has a number of national songs but among them all the Star Spangled Banner is chief favorite. Since the time of its writing the phrase "home of the free" has become literally true. The selection of this historic date for the historic expression of the feelings of Baltimore towards the captain of the cruiser bearing the city's name is peculiarly appropriate.

What a restfulness and charm some people possess through their evident sincerity. "Real people" seem to be growing fewer and fewer in this age of superficialities. One would fancy that even the appearance of sincerity was under fashionable ban and that the modern aim was to present a surface manner, a society veneer so that there would be no mistaking it for anything genuine. "A painted ship upon a painted ocean" can awaken more genuine emotion in us than the crowd of shadows that flit by as "people." To have a real place in the world one must be real. We sometimes feel that those we meet must have a hearty disapprobation of themselves as known to themselves because their efforts to hide the "Ego" are so patent. We may not always approve or even like the personality revealed by a sincere person, but we feel it and we must at least respect the genuineness of it. The chief charm of manner is simplicity and sincerity. When one gets outside these two "s's" manner ceases and "manners" begin. "Manner" is cultured but "manners" are essentially vulgar. The note of absolute sincerity will carry conviction and make an impression in every instance—not by trying but by an absence of effort.

We have had a long standing joke as to the total inability of our English cousins to see a "joke." We cannot blame them for their density when we read of the high handed action of our honored Ambassador, Mr. Choate. Mr. Choate has long held an enviable position as a prince of jest makers. We felt that his keen, incisive wit would stir even the sluggish British intellect. It has. More, it has seemed worthy of careful and studied attention and an enterprising maker of books after following the trail of Mr. Choate's wit with stenographer, scissors, paste and patience, prepared the Choate Jest Book. Here was the text book of wit and humor, a careful perusal of which would train the beef eaters to a measure of comprehension of American fun. But alas, 'twas not to be. Mr. Choate bought up the entire edition—and suppressed it. Some optimists hoped that he had purchased the edition meaning to present copies where his experience had taught him they would do the most good. Some venture to hint that a "jest book" and the high and mighty position of an ambassador cannot exist at one and the same time in the same nation. However it may chance, Mr. Choate has purchased the privilege of being his own jest book unless some starved scribbler sees the business opportunity presented by the possibility of selling an entire edition at sight and pirates some more Choate jokes to print. The British public must still catch the jokes "on the fly" or not at all.

The Church Army under the lead of Col. Hadley is making a great effort to rival the attractions of the cup that inebriates by the cup that cheers. Tea saloons with tea served over a bar are being established in many of the large cities. Col. Hadley argues that people drink beer and the like because these are easily secured. The tea saloons furnish both hot and iced tea. Arrangements are also made to sell the liquids in quantities. People come to these saloons with pitchers and pails and the sight of these receptacles on city streets is no longer equivalent to a conviction of "rushing the growler" as the local vernacular terms this method of ministrating to thirst. The movement has excited much interest and a corresponding amount of discussion. Some physicians express the belief that the "tea habit" may be as harmful physically as the habit of indulging in alcoholic beverages. Tea used in such excessive quantities that the tannin affects the system is certainly not an harmless substitute for liquor, but such instances of its use are rare enough to make a serious discussion of this result unprofitable. To substitute one vice for another is not radical reformation but the old adage, "of two evils choose the least" is practical advice at any rate. The excessive nervous strain that is a modern characteristic shows itself in a natural habit of drinking—ice water, soda water—"soft drinks" and those not "soft." The ice water habit may be as directly harmful in a physical way as the habit of strong drink. Physicians are not agreed in regard to the physical effect of stimulants and narcotics but there can be no ground of hesitation between the moral effect of tea drinking or the drinking of spirituous liquors. If the "tea saloon" furnishes the elements of good fellowship and social intercourse and supplants a bad habit with at least a better one the results will justify the efforts.

The county fair is here. How brightly the announcement gleams through the long hot vista of haying and early harvesting. Through all the varied amusements of his later years the country bred boy never forgets the wild joy of "fair time." The long procession of wagons that filled every county road, the blare of the brass band, the excitement of the booths with their mysteries of popcorn and pink lemonade, the appetizing odor of boiled onions and cabbage from some hall where an enterprising church society are serving dinner to those reckless enough to buy a dinner instead of bringing one to be eaten picnic fashion—all this and more made up the fascinating whole of the "Fair." Then after one day's wild dissipation the satisfying sense of two more days yet remained. What after taste of pomps and vanities can equal that "fun."

There has been a tendency to lament the fact that the county fairs were no longer an exhibit of agricultural products but rather a horse racing, vaudeville performance masquerading under the name of agricultural fair. This is a wrong idea and proceeds largely from the class of people who can gratify their pleasure loving taste anytime but who consider live stock and mammoth pumpkins as a new form of entertainment and resent the mixture of their bucolic pleasure with the more familiar form of amusement. The average farmer may and does take an honest pride in exhibiting the products of his farm, but after months of observation of their staples he appreciates the excitement of a balloon ascension or a juggling feat or the antics of a contortionist. The people who insist that a fair must be purely agricultural first, last and all the time, forget the old adage of "all work and no play." It is the contact with other people and the change from the daily routine that constitute the chief benefit of the "county fair."

During the month of September a convention of the most practical possibility will assemble in Huntsville, Alabama. This convention will give a careful and intelligent consideration to the problem of the industrial conditions of the South. Representative men from all portions of the South will be present. The present condition of the resources and industries of the South will be carefully considered and suggestions looking to the future development of this section will be given by practical business men. In the list of papers and discussions are the topics: cotton and cotton factories, iron, wool, timber, phosphates, railroads, dairying, legislation affecting capital and corporations, poultry stock, silk culture, banking, the press, minerals and pottery, the race problem, education, law diversification of industry and immigration. The South is still as it was in Colonial days, an agricultural section. The use of steam as a motive power has removed the bar to the manufacture of products where the raw material is found or produced and the future of the South lies in its development of the manufacture of its own products. This convention means much to the business interest of the nation. The new South is hardly a generation old. Its vast natural resources are as yet but partly developed. It is taking up the problem of its commercial future in a scientific spirit that bids fair to develop the section in a phenomenal manner. The Colonial history of the South is full of the efforts of the Southern colonists to find some staple agricultural product suited to the climatic conditions. The mention of a paper upon silk culture brings to mind the early effort of Virginia in this line. The South is the oldest section of our country and it is to-day the least developed section. Its resources are but partially comprehended even by its own citizens and the influence of the September convention cannot fail to produce speedy and far reaching results.

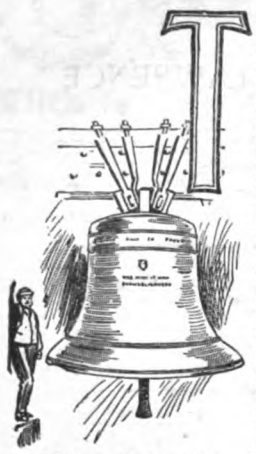
Some Good Advice to Singers.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

It is an old saying that nothing succeeds like success and to obtain the most successful results in any direction it is always well to take the advice of those who have most brilliantly won out the battle in their own lines. A short time ago COMFORT published in its musical department an entertaining account of that great singer Patti, and recently that great diva has charmingly given the public some account of her own work.

It is with pleasure that COMFORT is able to condense a few of these ideas, as they certainly will be an assistance to every singer, amateur or professional, who hopes to be a leader in this art. The rules she laid down for herself were wise and at the same time not difficult to follow if the singer were willing to exercise a little self denial. The very first point was to keep the vocal powers full with extreme care and to that end Mme. Patti never exposed herself.



Her care undoubtedly led to great exaggeration in newspapers which frequently stated in cynical terms her fear of catching cold. One imaginative writer for the press once related how all her clothing was marked with cabalistic signs; and that she carried a thermometer by which she reckoned addition or subtraction of a certain number of ounces of clothing as the mercury rose or fell in the tube. Someway or other her care seemed very ludicrous or eccentric to newspaper writers, and in one case it was told elaborately in detail of her slow progression from one room to another when the degree of heat varied, in order that the chill might not shock her.

As a matter of fact her rules were to harden up the body and build up the constitution; not to occupy overheated rooms at any time; to live outdoors at least two hours each day and to breathe plenty of good fresh air. She did not believe in muffling up the throat. On the contrary she did not believe in exposing one'sself to too much damp air. These are all good rules and should be followed by singers.

The song published in this number of COMFORT is a very beautiful one which will be generally admired. Under the music offer on another page COMFORT is sending thousands of sheets of music at about ten per cent. of the cost at the low sales in music stores. Read it and act at once.

A Notable Clock and Its Bells.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THERE are few clocks of the same universal fame as the Westminster clock in the great tower at the northwest corner of the British Houses of Parliament, known as "Big Ben." I recently had occasion to make an examination of this famous horological specimen.

A Londoner—"Big Ben" from the outside had been familiar enough to me, but a personal acquaintance as it were, was another matter. To be on mother earth and gaze upon the towering mass of masonry thirty-five feet square is one thing; it is another to climb the great tower and peer into the face of the giant measurer of Chronos.

"Big Ben's" tower is three hundred feet high and with its belfry spire twenty feet more, to ascend which is no mean undertaking for the lightest of hearts. Then one must be stout of limb and have good wind chests or the clock—to say nothing of the bells—will not be reached. Fortunately I am thus blessed, so, having submitted to much red-tapeism, I secured the necessary orders from the First Commissioner of Works. Accompanied by the janitor with lamps and keys we passed through a door at the foot of this giant tower. I looked up. It was an immense height of an apparently endless winding staircase. Far, far off could just be distinguished a dim light forcing its way in from the crannies. This was the top, leading to the clock room.

The ascent began—with the mournful prospect of having to mount six hundred steps and more, ere I could set hands or eyes upon the famous Westminster clock, or the famous specimen of the bell-founder's art which has been sounding the time for all London ever since 1858. It was slow work and right welcome were the occasional stoppages of my companion to turn on the gas jets which light up this wondrous staircase.

We climbed on—I getting wearier at every step until the welcome intimation that we were on the level of the clock room ended a journey which no asthmatical "party" ought to attempt. Through a small door and we were face to face with the notable Westminster clock—a masterpiece of horological ingenuity. It is somewhat strange that an eminent lawyer should have designed this famous clock, yet so it stands. Sir Edmund Beckett Denison, now Lord Grimthorpe is the highest authority upon clocks and bells.

The works of the Westminster clock are in a room twenty-eight feet by eighteen feet, lighted by a gas jet or two, but the actual frame of the clock which encloses the works is fifteen and one-half feet long by four feet seven inches wide. The pendulum weighs seven hundred pounds, four hundred and forty-eight of which are taken up by the "bob." It can be accelerated one second a day by putting on an ounce weight. At the ends of the works are the winders. The winding up of the going part takes ten minutes, while the winding up of the striking parts—the quarter part and the hour part—takes five hours each; and this has to be done twice a week. Two men perform this winding. From this room the time is communicated to the dials which keep a watchful eye on London's four sides. Upon close inspection the dials are immense—a size which can be best gauged by the statement of fact that it is the largest dial with minute hands in the world. They measure each twenty-two and one half feet in diameter or very nearly four hundred feet in area. The minute hands are sixteen feet long—the length of three average men—while the hour hand from the center of the dial to its extreme point measures six feet; and the figures to which they point are two feet long. The minute divisions at the outer circumference of the dials stand fourteen inches apart, so that in each half minute the pointer travels seven inches. There is no jump however. By the exquisite machinery of the clock the hands move continuously and without any visible jerk. The framework of each face of this huge timepiece weighs four tons, exclusive of the glass. This frame is of galvanized iron and the glass with which it is filled is a very expensive opal.

The lighting of the clock is effected by jets of gas on the whitened walls five feet behind the dials. An important consideration in timepieces, great and small, is their time-keeping qualities. In this respect Westminster clock cannot be beaten. One second for eighty-three days is all the error this clock makes, which can be said of no other clock in the world. This timekeeper reports itself to Greenwich Observatory daily by electric telegraph, giving two signals a day at an hour before and after noon for greater accuracy. From this fact has arisen a stupid yet popular misconception concerning it. Originally some enemy to the clock or of its designer, set about the report that it was "controlled," that is kept to time, by electrical connection with Greenwich. No such thing. It reports its own performance to the Observatory. A signal is sent from Greenwich at some hour daily for the information of the winding men, but they never touch the pendulum unless the error is two seconds, which happens very seldom.

Much more I might have learned concerning this famous timepiece, but as it was nearing twelve o'clock and I was anxious to be in the belfry when the bells gave off the hour, a higher stage on the journey had to be essayed.

The apartment resembles a huge iron cage with an open dome (leading to the lantern of the tower) and trellis-work iron flooring. The place abounds in iron girders and rafters after the fashion of a quay or pier landing stage. In the center is "Big Ben," 6 feet 6 inches in height, 9 feet in diameter, 27 feet in circumference and weighing 13 tons 11 cwt. Truly a colossal bell and the biggest one in Britain until the Men-Taylor cast "Great Paul," the monster bourdon bell of St. Paul's Cathedral, weighing 16 tons 14 cwt. 2 qrs. 19 lbs. Around "Big Ben" are suspended its solemn satellites, varying from six to four feet in diameter, large bells enough yet insignificant in the company of the great bell, which ought to sound the note E but doesn't because it is cracked.

Where is "Big Ben" cracked? I was just about making this examination for myself when there came a strain and a creaking as if the tower, or its upper part at least, were about to topple over. I clutched at my watch. It was just twelve o'clock and ere I had realized this the first note of the quarter sounded. Instantly the place was an almost unendurable pandemonium. The reverberations from the first quarter's chime had barely disentangled themselves ere the second quarter intensified matters. "Clang—clang" roared in the third series, creating a perfect sea of sound, and when the "ding-dong-dong-ding" of the final greater bells pealed in all this mixture of sound seemed lashed into fury. Escape it could not in so short a time, and the air around appeared a whirling maze of strong sound currents, hard for the head to endure.

This while I climbed the staging so as to actually feel the bell's throbbings under such terrific blows as would ensue from a hammer weighing four hundredweight. It trembled violently under its punishment. Little wonder, thought I, that it cracked when struck with a clapper double this weight, although the bell should have borne with an eight hundred weight clapper. Had it done so the sound would have been much louder than it now is.

At the final stroke of twelve o'clock I held the rim of "Big Ben" until its pulsations ceased; but it was some time afterwards ere the sound entirely disappeared in the air.

Dismounting I espied on the floor hard by the iron culprit which did the injury to "Big Ben" and it certainly looks capable of hurling destruction at anything coming in its way. It is only fair to say, however, that the non-amalgamation of the tin with the copper in the casting and not the weight of the clapper was the cause of "Big Ben's" cracking—a calamity which for many years has given London the questionable privilege of listening hourly to a bell which is deplorably out of tune. This, just over the heads of those who legislate for Great Britain and its dependencies, is a sorry commentary upon the musical perceptions of England's Senators! That it was in casting that the defect in "Big Ben" arose is clearly established by the section of metal which has been cut from the rim of the bell.

We now made for the terrace outside the belfry from which a magnificent view of London's four sides is obtained. The heights on the north side of the great city are discernible while one seems almost able to touch the dome of St. Paul's and such high structures as the Monument. Looking down, human beings appear as so many flies and horses and vehicles look no bigger than mice tied to tiny conveyances.

Only twice in its history has the clock ceased in its time recording functions. On the first occasion a heavy fall of snow clogged the hands preventing their traveling. The next time it was stopped purposely. This was on the 15th of September, 1880, when the reason of the cessation was to allow workmen to erect a scaffold in the clock room for the purpose of repairing and decorating, and while that was going on the opportunity was taken to clean the works of the clock.

The expenditure upon this great clock and bells is a matter which is often debated. Well, the dials and hands together—by a piece of blundering—cost £5,334, or more than the whole outlay for the works and the striking parts in the bell chamber above; so that £10,000 might be set down as a round figure for its original value.

FINLAND.

KANTELE PLAYER.

IN northern Europe, bounded by the Baltic Sea and the Gulf of Finland, by Russia and Lapland, is a country little known to us, but worthy of our attention. Finland is twice the size of New England, it is not a day's journey from Christiana in Sweden or St. Petersburg in Russia, its scenery is delightful and sport is abundant, yet the tourist seems to have overlooked it.

Finland is not Lapland, neither do the people live in tents made of skin, nor travel from place to place with herds of reindeer. Finland is by far the most civilized portion of the great Russian Empire and it rivals in culture many of the better known countries of Europe.

To understand the present condition of Finland one must know something of its history. The ancient Finns probably lived in large village communities, governed by chiefs, each tribe hostile to its neighbor. They were pagans but we know little of their religious or other customs. In 1157 Finland was invaded by the Swedes who united the clans and formed the Finns into a nation. Sweden, however, having a liberal government established the same in the captured country, and in spite of being in subjection to the Swedish monarch Finland has practically governed herself always. The greatest disadvantage of the invasion was that the Finnish language was set aside among the higher classes and all the culture, literature, laws and government business was henceforth in Swedish, and inaccessible to the common people. The church, however, retained the tongue of the people so that it was not altogether lost.

In 1808 Finland was conquered by Russia after a most heroic defence, and to-day it is a part of the great Slavonic Empire though the introduction of Russian officials into the country has made but little change in its customs. The Russian language has not been accepted by any portion of the former inhabitants of the land, and this third language we find spoken only by the representatives of the Tsar. The question of language is a serious one in Finland. Even the signs at the corners of the streets are printed in three languages, and in the parliament an interpreter is constantly needed to interpret speeches of the peasants to the gentry and again to the Russian officials.

Suomi is the name the Finns give to their country. Some one has said that Finland is like a sponge with the holes representing the lakes, and the simile is a good one. A person may travel almost from end to end of the country by water, using the rivers and chains of lakes as his highway. Every wealthy Finn owns his own lake where he and his family settle for the summer on the charming well wooded islands.

The Finns are a very hospitable people, always glad to welcome strangers and show them the beauties of their land, so little of which is known to the outside world. Their family life is very delightful, family gatherings being a matter of daily occurrence.

A Finn never hurries, he takes life easily and if the trains are not on time it troubles no one, or if the boat starts at midnight when it is billed to start at noon it is no cause of worry to the passengers.

HARD SCRATCHING.

The cities are not unlike those of any country of northern Europe. The houses are securely built with windows that are seldom open for in winter the cold is intense and in summer the people of the better class leave the towns deserted. Helsingfors, the capital, is a town of 70,000 inhabitants. Here is the University and a very good one it is. Women, as well as men, are admitted and it is the centre of society, in the capital, in winter. Women hold a most enviable position in this northern land, that is women of the better classes. They are admitted to almost every occupation and are much respected whatever their occupation. On the other hand the peasant women do much hard manual labor which we should think fit only for men to perform. Every one rides the bicycle in Finland and though the roads are rough the easy going Finn bumps along and thoroughly enjoys it. Fortunately there are almost no hills for Finland is a flat country. Boating, too, is very popular in the summer, and the canoe, not unlike our Indian canoe, may be seen threading its way among the islands of the lakes, through the long summer days, or drifting idly about in the glorious twilight, which in that northern clime lasts far into the night, fading into the dawn. The 24th of June is the great fete of the year. It is Johannulta or Midsummer Day, when the sun goes round without setting and shines brightly even at midnight. Then are burned the Kokko fires. This is in accordance with an ancient pagan custom of unknown origin. Great piles of tar barrels, trees, and anything else combustible are placed on a raft, on a hill top, or at the water's edge and ignited. Every one, old and young, dance about as the fire bursts into flames, singing their national airs, playing games and making merry. If the fire does not smoulder until morning it is a bad omen for the coming year.

Finland is thoroughly musical. Every Finn sings a part and in any place and at any time, waiting for a train to start, or on the arrival of a steamer the crowd may break into song, and sing well. A grand musical festival is held annually, each year in a different town. There is much competition between the choirs which are sent from all parts of the country. The old national airs are the favorites and are often weird and strange in their movement. Some of them date back to the times before history began in Finland and are sung by the Runo Singers, accompanied by the native instrument called the Kantele. By means of these ancient songs much of the tradition of early Finland is preserved. The Runo Singers are dreamy men and women much beloved by the people for they are the poets of the land, and the historians. And think not for a moment that Finland lacks in men of letters. Yes, and it boasts, too, of several women who have made their mark in literature. Probably the best known Finnish work is the epic poem, Kaleuala. This is a collection of the traditions and ancient customs of Finland which the peasants, far removed from civilization, chanted, sang, or told of their country and its heroes. These were passed on from generation to generation and were at last collected and written down. The poem is full of myth and poetical feeling and is, to the Finn, his connecting link between the past and the present.

Finland's wealth is in its forests. Everywhere are the magnificent pines towering high toward the brilliant sky, or the beautiful silvery birches swaying their bright green foliage in graceful curves. Even the mats on the floor are made of the branches with the green leaves on them. The pine trees are a source of immense wealth on account of the tar which they yield, and which forms the principal article of the export trade of Finland.

Everywhere the scenery is beautiful, the fishing is unrivalled, and summer sports of all kinds may be enjoyed beneath a sky of such brilliancy as is found nowhere save in northern lands in the summer. Then comes the long, cold, dark winter. For many days the sun is low on the horizon or appears not at all. But there is compensation for this. The hard, black ice invites hundreds of skaters; in the woods the hunter on skis tracks the deer or the bear, while the sledges are all busy drawing the loads which cannot be hauled over the rough roads in summer. It is a time for merry-making and for visiting, and parties even cross the Baltic to Sweden on the ice.

Railroads connect all the important towns of Finland, steamers cross the largest lakes; telegraph service though expensive is not unknown, and as for the telephone—every one has one, no house being complete without one.

But now when we find Finland far to the front in civilization we ask ourselves, "Whence comes this trouble with Russia?" It is because of its advance that Finland is now suffering from the fear of the yoke. From ancient times she has had her freedom, though ruled by a foreign king. She has had her representative parliament and no law could be passed without its consent, and the Russian Tsars have honored the constitution and rights of the people. Within the present year while the Tsar is talking of disarmament for all nations he proposes to Finland that the Finnish army be incorporated into the Russian army, liable to calls from any part of the empire, from Kamchatka to the Dneiper; and furthermore he proposes to take away the right of parliament to veto, thus giving full power to the Tsar to pass whatever laws he thinks best. It is evident, also, from the inducements held out, that the Tsar intends that Russian shall supplant the Finnish and Swedish languages in Finland. Against all this the people are earnestly protesting but the Tsar is deaf to their remonstrances.

With Russia "Might makes right"' and the Russians would like nothing better than a pretext for calling out troops to quell a rebellion in Finland. But the Finns have been wise, have shown good judgment and much courage, and their natural phlegm and caution have turned to their advantage, and it is to be hoped that with unity at home and a general feeling of sympathy among other nations the cause of Finland will not suffer at the hand of the "Prince of Peace" as they have sarcastically named the Tsar.

WELTMERISM REVEALED TO ALL.

Weltmerism, the Method of Magnetic Healing, originated by Prof. S. A. Weltmer of Nevada, Mo., in its wide scope of doing good for suffering humanity, does not only cure diseases of all nature but makes it impossible for disease to exist. This is a fact that has been substantiated by the many thousands of cures made. All physicians, all scientists, in fact all who know the physiology of the human race know that if the organs of circulation, secretion and excretion are in perfect condition, perfect health is attained. Magnetic Healing, now known as Weltmerism, restores, without the aid of medicine, these organs to their natural function and the disease is banished. The patients are not only permanently cured of the then existing disease but are so strengthened physically that their system is such a formidable foe to disease that disease cannot exist. Take, for instance, woman in her monthly trial, if she is in perfect health, the monthly period instead of being a dread and a pain will be a renewal of strength and vigor. This great method cures lost manhood, debilitation in both sex, indigestion, dyspepsia, stomach trouble in fact, any disease known to man or woman, and this without the aid of medicine that so often ruins a constitution, which under the Weltmer method of magnetic healing is made strong. The present generation should be, indeed, thankful for this great method of Magnetic Healing which bids the afflicted not only to hope but positively tells them that their affliction will be cured. From the press and pulpit come words of gratitude, voicing the sentiments of thousands who have been cured by the wonderful scientific method, known as absent treatment, which annihilates space and perfects marvelous cures at a distance, making it possible to permanently cure those who cannot go to Nevada, Mo. Thereby giving the benefit of this great blessing to all classes of people. Substantiating all the good things that have been said of Weltmerism are thousands of testimonials from people who have been cured of every imaginable disease through this marvelous curative power, a few of which we publish.

PROF. WELTMER.

Hon. Press Irons, Mayor of Nevada, was afflicted with kidney and bladder troubles for ten years and could find no relief in the usual remedies. In one week he was completely restored by Prof. Weltmer.

Mrs. Jennie L. Linch, Lakeview, Mo., was for two years afflicted with ulceration of the womb, heart and stomach troubles and general debility; was reduced to a mere skeleton. Cured by the Weltmer Absent Treatment. In less than 30 days gained 15 pounds.

Mrs. Lavisa Dudley, Larry, Ill., suffered for thirty years with neuralgia and stomach troubles. Nothing but morphine would relieve her. Permanently cured in a few weeks by the Absent Method of treatment.

Mr. John S. Small, Colfax, Ill., was deaf in his left ear for seven years; could not hear a watch tick when placed against his ear. Was permanently cured in three days by Prof. Weltmer.

Anyone writing to Prof. S. A. Weltmer, Nevada, Mo., will receive a 40-page illustrated magazine and a list of testimonials from men and women who owe their health and happiness to Weltmerism; also much information on this science of healing.

THE WELTMER METHOD TAUGHT TO OTHERS.

PROF. KELLY Sec'y and Treas.

The American School of Magnetic Healing is organized under the laws of the State of Missouri. Prof. Weltmer is the president of this institution, and Prof. J. H. Kelly the secretary and treasurer. It is impossible for Prof. Weltmer to attend to the enormous demands made upon him to cure. He therefore wishes others to take up his profession, so that he may call upon them to assist him in his noble work. With this in view the American School of Magnetic Healing was founded. The method perfected and in use by this school is so complete in all its details that the students become as efficient as Prof. Weltmer himself, in this great art to cure, in ten days. This noble profession is taught either by mail or personal instructions. Anyone who desires can learn it, and anyone who learns can practice it. This has been abundantly proven by the great number who have been instructed and who are in the active practice of healing by this method. This is beyond doubt the best paying profession of the age, as students who have learned this method through the American School of Magnetic Healing are earning from $10 to $50 per day.

Prof. J. H. Kelly, Sec'y, Nevada, Mo.:

Dear Sir:—Your mail course in Magnetic Healing was received some months ago. After reading same, I caught your idea and at once proceeded to put it into practice, and found I could accomplish all and even more than I anticipated. I have never failed to get immediate results in all cases treated, and I have made a number of cures in cases that have been given up by the best of our physicians as incurable. I expect to devote my entire time to this work, but should I never use it outside of myself or family, would consider it the best investment I ever made.

J. T. IGLEHART, Meridian, Miss.

Read of this Modern Scientific Machine that Heals, Teaches and Amuses.

Electricity no longer the master but the servant of man, represents to us light, heat and force. By these three great powers everything on earth lives and electricity means life. This grand machine is a combined motor and dynamo and gives a perfect electric organization. Most interesting and instructive of the recent products of electrical science; teaches and instructs while it amuses, young and old alike. Scientific in construction and no student or ingenious boy should be without it. Perfectly harmless, but produces no end of fun, by giving shocks to circles and many harmless tricks. FOR A HOME CURER. Doctors know almost every known disease and pain yields readily to electrical currents. The cost of electric batteries as generally sold places them far beyond reach of any but the wealthy. This Electrical Machine has been produced by the latest and most improved machinery and at nominal cost as compared with the expensive batteries formerly sold at $8, $10 or $20 each. The great improvements in machinery enables us to produce this and to offer it to you for a mere trifle. See What Electricity is Used For. There is no disease of the nerves or any bodily pain which will not yield readily to electric currents. This wonderful machine utilizes the forces of nature; drives out Rheumatic Pains, Neuralgia and every species of blood and nerve disease; Cures Weakness of every kind and nature and restores youthful health and vigor. Works like a miracle for that worn out feeling and languor and despondency and strengthening nervous system with a direct (not alternating) current, large in volume but pleasant to take, no shock or irritation. Patent switch adjusts current to weakest child or strongest man. A valuable treatise by Dr. Cutten accompanies every machine shipped. We now place nature's great restorative agent, Electricity, within the reach of every sufferer rich or poor.

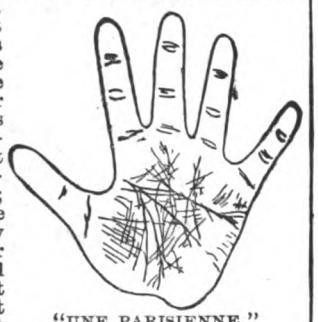
CONDUCTED BY DIGITUS.

I MUST enter another protest against the carelessness of many people who send their impressions to me for reading. I have before me three letters of complaint from people who say they have sent their hands some months ago but have never seen any readings. I have also one package of smoked paper impressions containing not a line or a mark anywhere in or outside the package by which I can guess where it comes from. In the cases of the three letters of complaint the hands have never been received. Now, how is it possible for me to comply with the requests unless you will on your side comply with the full instructions and conditions which are so often given in this column.

I will, however, state them once more as explicitly as possible. Never send a package of impressions without placing inside of them, on the back of the impressions preferably, the name and address of the sender with the nom de plume desired. So much is allowed by the postal authorities in a package. If a note is contained, full letter postage would have to be paid on the package. Unless these instructions are complied with it is utterly impossible for me to keep track of your readings and I cannot even read those which do not contain a nom de plume or any scrap of information. It is always best to send the letter in the package but if you don't, please remember that you must positively put your name and address on the back of the impressions, as with so many impressions coming into this office at once it is utterly impossible to distinguish them if they are not properly labelled. Have I said enough, so that you will be careful hereafter?

A lady of Chalk Mound, Kansas, has written two letters with regard to impressions of her hands which she claims to have sent last January. I have here a package of hands without a line on them anywhere, but they are taken on the back of certain paper advertising a corset from Little Rock. It is possible that these are her hands although they have not on them the nom de plume which she claims—Despondent. I will give her a reading from these hands as I do not know who they can belong to if they are not hers. If they are not hers will she please send a new impression, referring to this reading and her former letters, and I will try it over again. This seems to be the best I can do.

I also have two letters from a gentleman in Eliza, Ky. with regard to his reading of hands sent in March. These I have never received. Will be kindly forward them at once. Again M. A. of Portland, Ore., claims to have sent hands which have never been received. If she will forward them once more and have them properly marked with her name I will read them as soon as possible.



"DESPONDENT."

"Despondent" denotes the hand which I shall read and which I referred to above as being unlabelled. I should judge by the appearance of the hand that the owner of it would naturally be of a desponding disposition and that she would be easily discouraged by the many petty troubles which always have and will beset her path. She has a strong, fearless nature which has helped her through many troubles, but her disposition causes her to worry somewhat and this she cannot help. Her health has never been of the very best. I should judge she has some constitutional weakness which leads her to look on the dark side of things rather than on the light. She has had interference from outside people, some of whom have been very near to her heart and these have caused her many worries. She has never been allowed to go her own way without consulting the wishes of others. She should take courage, however, because later, say after she has passed the age of forty, her lines are much clearer and life will be much brighter for her. Some outside change will come after fifty and she will have peace and comfort through to the end. She will live to be at least seventy. There are many journeys but they are short ones and will never lead her far from her native place. Her head line is deeply indented in many places which would indicate periods of great grief or else some nervous trouble or affection of the brain, possibly nothing more serious than severe headaches. There has been some serious disappointment in matters of the heart early in life before this person was twenty, which not only affected her heart but her head as well, bringing great grief and making life very dark for a time. She recovers from this, however, and marries at about thirty. She will have several engagements but her last marriage, which will take place at about fifty, will be much the best and most successful. "Despondent" should be patient and keep up her courage as the world will certainly grow brighter for her after middle life; in fact the first twenty-five years of her life are much the hardest. She has a strong character, a kind heart and good disposition, with a philosophic temperament and artistic tendencies. This impression has not been secured with fixative and is somewhat rubbed so that it is not possible to make out all the lines clearly.

It is a pleasure to take up such an impression as is sent by "Une Parisienne" which is beautifully taken and carefully secured with fixative which makes it easy to read. This hand was accompanied by a separate letter but it was also marked plainly with the nom de plume and on the outside of the carefully-done-up package the name and address of the sender. This is exactly as it should be and is what I desire everyone who sends hands to this department to do.

"Une Parisienne" has a hand which denotes a light and rather volatile temperament with strong characteristics and a very sensitive nature. She is a person of great tact and knows how to manage other people beautifully, never making enemies and understanding how to meet whims and caprices of others; at the same time she has very strong will power and can control others without their knowing it or in the least understanding why. In matters of the heart she is rather capricious. She has many admirers and is somewhat fickle to outside appearances although when she finds the right man she will be true to him even though she may not be able to resist her natural tendency to a flirtation. She is married somewhere from twenty-five to thirty and will outlive her first husband. A second marriage will take place much later in life. She is highly successful in whatever she undertakes although most of her success will come during the latter part of her life. She will have riches and will be well known. However, she will always have some difficulties to contend with, many of which will be due to her own disposition and temperament. Her right hand is better than her left, showing that she has made a good use of all her faculties and developed them to the utmost. Some change took place in her early life before she was fifteen which has materially affected life since that time. It is impossible for me to say what that change was, but possibly she has not followed exactly what her parents designed for her. As I said before, however, her life will be successful and happy in the main although she will see many troubles which might break down an ordinary woman. She has a very strong, firm character with great perseverance and energy, always carrying through what she undertakes. She is highly artistic and would make a good musician or teacher of languages or physics. She would also probably succeed upon the stage or lecture platform as she has great powers of oratory and mimicry. There are no bad signs in her hand, everything pointing to ultimate success and triumph, but her temperament will cause her to see many discouraged moments. She has asked for everything I can see in her hands. I have given this although in many cases when this is asked for the person finds fault afterwards.

"UNE PARISIENNE."

"If "Lygia" will send fresh impressions of her hands at once, taking particular care to put the nom de plume on the back of impression, I will be glad to give her another reading as there seems to have been some mistake about the former one. I fear that it was one of those hands which was not properly labelled.

F. O. H. wishes to know where in the hand are refinement and gentleness shown. These are read from the entire character of the hand taken as a whole or at least of the palm, as are also the qualities of patience and perseverance. The latter are shown, however, partly by the distance between the head and life line at the start. Squares on the mount of the moon would show some protection at the period of life indicated by the connecting lines. If on the fate line the age would have to be reckoned according to the ages on that or if on the head line it would show some serious brain trouble at the age indicated. From the diagram sent it is impossible to tell exactly.

May I ask once more that you will seriously consider the conditions which I have mentioned above.

ANOTHER READER HAS BEEN MAKING MONEY EASILY.

I noticed in a recent number of your valuable paper that one of your readers had been very successful selling Baird's Non-Alcoholic Flavoring Powders, and thought my experience would be interesting too. It is simply wonderful how much better these new fruit flavoring powders are than the liquid extracts sold in stores, when you stop to think they cost only about half as much. You use them for cakes, custards, candies, ice cream etc., just like the liquid. We used them ourselves and liked them so well that I wrote the manufacturers, W. H. Baird & Co., 247 Telephone Bldg., Pittsburg, Pa., for samples and tried selling them to my neighbors. I only commenced a short time ago, but the powders are fast becoming celebrated around here and I have built up a steady trade from regular customers, often making over $25.00 a week. I never knew of such an easy way to make money and I would recommend anyone having a little spare time to write this firm, for they are very generous in their dealings. R.L.C.

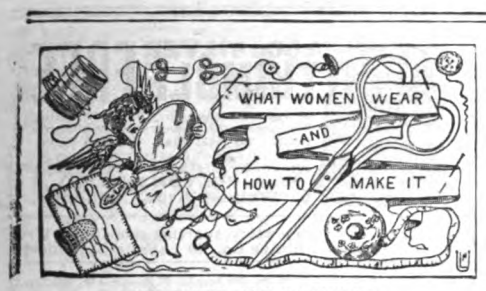
RHEUMATISM IS DEAD!

Long Live OXIEN, the King of Remedies that Killed it.

No more infernal tortures, no more roastings of the flesh with red hot irons, no more lightning shocks from the electric battery or dosings with dangerous drugs.

RHEUMATISM HAS BEEN CONQUERED by Oxien the triumph of medicine, the Godsend of the age. Absolute cures are now certain, and Oxien is making them every day. In this connection



WE HAVE A WORD TO SAY.

Oxien was last year put to the test as a remedy for Rheumatism and it made a record of absolute cures in Acute Rheumatism, frequently called rheumatic fever, Pericarditis (inflammation of the investing membrane of the heart), Endocarditis (inflammation of the living membrane of the heart), subacute rheumatism, sometimes applied to the less severe attacks of the disease, chronic rheumatism, which swells and twists the joints and sciatica, or neuralgia of the sciatic nerve. In fact Oxien is guaranteed to cure Rheumatism in any form. Thousands jump for joy and many write as follows:

Received OXIEN O. K. Found it far superior to what you represent. Have tried everything I could hear of for rheumatism. For ten years I have been crippled up with this terrible disease. Laid in bed one whole year. Could not turn or feed myself and when I was able to walk on crutcher (which I did for four years) was crooked and unable to straighten up, but Oxien did it and you can imagine how happy I am now. Yours sincerely, Geo. P. Lawton, Olympia, Wash., Feby. 9th, 1898.

FREE 200,000 BOXES OF RHEUMATISM CURE. FREE. This momentous offer we make in order to more thoroughly introduce this amazing rheumatism remedy in the United States and Canada. None but those who will give us their word that they either suffer from rheumatism, or are afraid of it through hereditary tendencies will be considered entitled to free treatment. Therefore, if you want a box free send at once, yes to-day. Write plainly as our clerks are badly rushed.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

IF ever there was a time when envy, hatred and malice, to say nothing of fully developed uncharitableness, were stirred up and likely to envelop all in a comprehensive wave, that time is now. How can it be otherwise? All around us are things of beauty we cannot possess—gowns of surpassing loveliness, hats of surprising extravagance and chic, jewels so rare and glittering that the purse and heart pour out their treasure before them, and yet are far from securing them. Choice of garments has become a burden to the soul, for where all is lovely, how to select the loveliest, and most difficult task of all, how to close one's eyes to the beauties that fade and be sternly virtuous in the selection of the things that "wear." The woman of limited means has a modern martyrdom before her, a discipline she will hardly relish, but which she cannot evade. Looking at the matter from all sides I should be inclined to think that her hardest task will lie in the selection of her cape or coat.

The shawl model at which we wondered and scoffed a year ago has revenged itself by ousting all other modes. In a greater or less degree every cape has a pointed back; if not actually and literally pointed, it is certainly far longer at the back than at the front.

Heresy as it is always deemed to cavil at what Madame la Mode may decree is fitting we should wear, I yet venture to assert that it takes a very well-dressed and essentially smart woman to carry these sloping wraps with any degree of distinction. Badly put on they reduce the wearer either to a general aspect of untidiness, or convert her into something quite the reverse of a thing of beauty. One point it is imperative should be considered for each individual and that is the position at which the curves of the trimmings are put—a little higher, or a little lower makes all the difference between a "May pole" effect and chic.

Like the mystic ladies of old we are to fade away into earth in voluminous folds which conceal the feet, and taper towards heaven with shoulders compressed into the most sloping of lines. The caricaturist has ample scope for his powers in the distant view or outline of a fashionable woman. It is only close acquaintance that reveals the loveliness of the creation which she wears, for it must be conceded that manufacturers have excelled themselves; if it were not so, some of the modes would be unsupportable. Eton jackets and shirt-waisted open-fronted coats find a large amount of favor for regular wear and all of them are made to fit into the figure at the waist, for this reason; sacque back garments have gone out of date.

Skirts continue to be quite tight-fitting around the front and over the hips, but there is slightly more fullness at the back and the prevailing idea among all the newest skirts is to have the center of the back seam completely closed up, the opening being at the left side seam; the best place for the pocket is in the back seam below the fullness of the figure.

Lace robes and silk gauzes are being very much used for fete gowns, the foundation being of glace or a soft make of Duchesse, called Oriental satin. If made to order, costumes of this kind run into a lot of money, but any one who has the time to spare and the inclination can produce one of these high-class costumes for a very small outlay. All that is needed is a good, reliable pattern of a foundation, on which the shaped out skirt is loosely arranged and the bodice pieces gathered over the tight-fitting foundation. Fifteen yards of glace or soft satin would be sufficient to make a skirt and bodice foundation, including a silk frill for decorating the hem of the skirt.

Fine quality French wool poplins are very much in favor for making up into better class gowns for wearing to church or various fashionable gatherings. Gray, orchid shades and stone colors are the most popular and the foundation is generally some brilliant hue that harmonizes with the shade of the dress.

A pretty Paris model is made up of pale gray poplin lined throughout with cerise glace silk: the sleeves and the square back and front of the bodice are all-over guipure lace, the rich colored silk beneath showing through the meshes of the lace with a particularly pleasing effect; satin to match the gray material is used to swath the shoulders and outline the fullness of the figure, somewhat in the style of bolero. An eight inch circular flounce at the foot of the skirt is finished with two tiny bias ruffles, each edged with a tiny piping of gray satin.

At the present moment, when nine out of every ten women wear a lace bow beneath the chin, or if not actually lace, something of the kind, it is just as well for them to be told that every soft bow does not suit every face or every complexion, and that it is wise for a woman to find what special style of soft fluffiness does become her before embarking upon a purchase of it. As a rule, the cream colored lace bows are more becoming than those of dead white, and the soft silk bows, either plain or with tiny sprays of flowers on them are very charming.

FICHU EFFECT.

A very suitable gown for the season is presented here being tailor made, and yet having that chic which only the touch of the French can impart; the soft, fluffy vest of creamy mousseline de soie, laid in fine French tucks and tiny frills, and the revers of yellow lace instead of cloth, giving an air of grace and daintiness to the costume very pleasing to see. The long, trailing skirt has a habit back with the braided pattern outlining a jacket shape over the hips, running up either side of the open jacket front and finishing at the center of the back. The same trimming ornaments the foot of the skirt. The material chosen for this gown is a decidedly yellow shade of tan melton with a finish like velvet, while the braid is black picked out with white.

No end of smart bodices are being shown for

NERVES.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

HOW often do we hear the cry from some poor overworked, overworried woman "Oh, I am so nervous!"

Now, sister mine, I am going to free my mind to you on that subject. I know you are overworked, and your nerves are all unstrung, but what is the use of thinking of it, even? It does not mend matters, it only makes them worse.

When I was a girl in my teens I was as "nervous" as any one, but my wise and sensible mother never allowed me to say so, but always talked as if nerves were rather disgraceful things to own, and should be kept entirely in the background.

I shall never forget my first and only fit of hysteria, which occurred when I was about eighteen years old. I never had another, for this same wise and tender mother, when she had scolded and threatened me until I had succeeded, unaided, in regaining control of myself, fondled me into calmness while gently and clearly explaining what had been the matter with me, and the means which I should have taken to prevent the attack; and, fortified and enlightened by her counsels, I never again allowed myself to get into such a state.

I take no credit to myself that I am not now a nervous, hysterical woman. I attribute it wholly to my mother's wise, tender and watchful care of me; and I have the greatest pity for the many women who are helpless victims to hysteria in its many forms, and say to myself "Oh, why was there not some one to warn them in the beginning of the danger of giving way to their feelings!" When one has once given way it is easy to do it again; so I say to you Don't do it. Keep a firm hold of yourself to be calm and quiet. Above all else, don't worry over things. A little worry does more harm than a great deal of work. If you can help a trouble, do so, but if you cannot, do not spend your strength worrying about it. Turn your thoughts to something else. Try to keep your surroundings pleasant. Don't use a spluttering pen or a gritty pencil, a rusty or a blunt needle, or a pan or kettle that leaks and needs the constant application of twists of rag to the hole. Never have dull tools. Keep a small whetstone or grindstone in the kitchen, and see to it that knives and scissors are always sharp. Oil your creaking door-hinge, and pay prompt attention to the smallest cry from your sewing machine. Try to have an easy chair without rockers for your uneasy caller, and doctor the complaining joints of the rocking chair with a little oil or a drop of glue. If Johnnie's new shoes nearly drive you frantic with their squeak just take a small gimlet and bore a hole half way through the sole from the inside of the shoe. This gives a vent for the air between the layers of sole leather, and lo! the horrible sound is stilled.

All these things may be trifles, but it is generally the little things of life that rasp the overstrained nerves of the tired woman.

One thing more, and I have done. Always make a point of reserving to yourself some time in the course of the day, even if it is only fifteen minutes, when you can shut yourself up alone for a complete rest of mind and body. Lie down, close your eyes, fold your hands, and think of—nothing—for as long a time as you can spare from your other duties; for this, I assure you, is as much your duty as any other part of the day's doings. You have no idea, until you have tried it, how much this little rest will help you through the remainder of the day's trials, nor what a quietus it puts upon those troublesome "nerves."

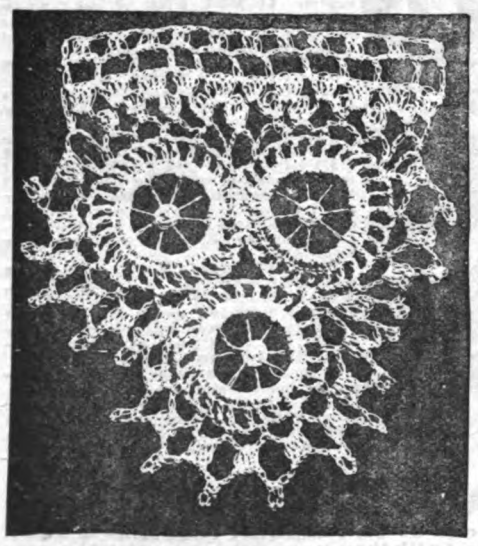
WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

TATTING has grown very popular of late. Twenty years or more ago it was in high favor, and this is not to be wondered at, for it is so delightful to make it, and the wearing qualities recommend themselves as being far ahead of the average fancy work,—reasons which in themselves are enough to make it a popular trimming; the only wonder is that it should ever have gone out of favor—or fashion—as it has.

For children's aprons, collars and underclothes it is unsurpassed in daintiness, and for decorative purposes such as tidies it is also desirable. An illustration herewith shows a section of a linen handkerchief which has a fulled ruffle of bobinet lace, at the top and bottom of which is a row of the smallest sized tatting loop,—making altogether a dainty, durable and odd handkerchief. The handkerchief itself may first be made, if so desired, by buying fine linen, cutting it by the thread into the size of square desired, and then hemstitching it. After this the tatting is sewn on, and then the footing is fulled onto the tatting, and lastly another row of tatting is sewed onto the edge of the footing. The footing is a narrow lace net that is woven with self edges,—some plain, and some with a dot. That about one and one-fourth inches wide costs five cents a yard.

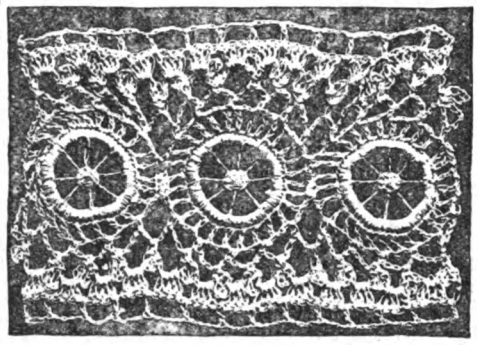
We give directions for making a doiley, or tidy of tatting and the same directions may be used in several different ways for small, large, round, square, or diamond shaped doileys—according to the wish or ingenuity of the maker.



A DAINTY HANDKERCHIEF.

Make 16 rings in a row, each ring consisting of 6 d. s. and 5 p. Join rings in usual way; also join 16th ring to 1st ring thus forming a circle; fasten ring under last ring.

Make each ring of 2nd round with 12 d. s. and 5 p. separated by 2 d. s.; join the rings in the usual way. Make 1st. ring, draw up and join to 3rd p. in 1st ring in last round; join 2nd and 3rd rings to 2nd and 3rd rings in last round; join 4th and 5th rings to 4th ring in last round; continue in same way all round, always joining, 2 rings to every 4 rings in last round; there must be 20 rings in 2nd round. Make 3 more circles like the one just made and join the 4 to form a square. Then make a row of large and small rings all round the 5 circles. Take the shuttle and begin at one corner by making a small ring of 4 d. s. and 3 p; join 2nd p. to 3rd p. of ring in corner of circle, turn make a large ring, 16 d. s. and 7 p. separated by 2 d. s.; turn, make another small ring like 1st except that you join the 1st p. to last p. of 1st ring; finish ring, turn, make a small ring, join 1st p. to last p. of large ring, turn, make small ring, join 2nd p. to 3rd p, of 2nd ring of circle, turn and continue making large and small rings until you have joined 7 small rings on the side of a corner circle; then make 5 small rings in the inside of row to the next circle; then join 14 small rings around the 2nd corner; continue on side as before and so on around the square. There must always be a small ring between each 2 large rings on the outside circle, and always a small ring between every 2 that are joined to circle; join last ring to 1st in usual way.



The next 2 rounds are composed of wheels. Each wheel has a center ring and 10 small surrounding rings. Make center with 11 d. s. and 10 p., draw up, make small ring with 6 d. s. and 5 p. join 3rd p. to 4th p. of 1st large ring on corner of last row, finish ring, draw up, join to 1st of p. of center. Make 9 more, joining each ring in usual way; also join each ring to center and the last ring to 1st; fasten thread under wheel.

Now leave 1-2 inch of thread, make 2nd wheel like 1st except join 1st and 2nd rings to 4th and 3rd rings of last wheel; make 3rd ring, then join 4th ring to next large ring in last round; finish wheel like 1st which makes 2 wheels on corner. Make 3rd wheel, join 1st 2 rings to last wheel, make 3rd ring, skip 1 large ring in last row and join 4th ring to next large ring; finish wheel. Always skip a large ring in last row between each wheel, until you reach 3 large rings on corner; then join a wheel to each large ring around corner; then make next side like last. Continue all around on last corner, and join a wheel to last large ring so there will be 3 wheels on corner. Join last wheel to 1st in usual way. Fasten the thread under the wheel, and make last round of wheels same as 1st round, except that you join 1st wheel to wheel on side; finish wheel same as last row. Make 2nd wheel, join 1st ring to 3rd ring in last wheel, join 3rd wheel to next wheel of last row, and finish it. Continue joining wheel to each wheel on side until you reach 3 wheels on corner, join a wheel to 1st wheel on corner, then make 1 wheel without joining, then join 1 to corner wheel, then make a wheel again without joining, and so continue until the doily has as many rows as is desired.

Mrs. Darrow, of Minneapolis, has sent us directions for making a very pretty crochet edge, with insertion to match, and which we also illustrate. She says:

"This makes a handsome trimming for aprons; one could be trimmed with the insertion only. I use No. 30 Coats' thread. To make the rings put the thread on the fore finger of the left hand just below the nail and wind around the finger 30 times; slip this coil off, hold it between the thumb and forefinger of the left hand, crochet s. c. stitch all around the ring, keeping the stitches close together, draw thread through the first s. c. stitch. Make 5 ch, slip 1 s. c. and make 1 tr., 2 ch, skip 1 s. c. and tr. in stitch; repeat until you have worked all around the ring. Cut the thread, leaving 3 inches of thread to fasten into thick part of rink; cut thread close. With a needle and thread make a spider stitch in center of each ring; the first ring is finished entirely; the others are joined according to illustration.

The insertion is joined in straight rows according to illustration, crocheting edges on each side. Another way to make trimming with the rings is to join as for insertion, but don't crochet any edge; instead, baste smoothly on cloth, sew the edges down; then make button-hole stitch over the edge, top and bottom, onto cloth. Cut away the cloth that is under the rings. This makes a handsome insertion. For an edge sew the row of rings on to the edge of hem or cloth so that one-half of ring comes below, then button-hole the top edge on; then cut away the cloth that is under the ring and crochet an edge on the bottom of rings. There is a great variety of ways to use the rings; they make a handsome yoke for nightdress or wrapper; or use only in front of yoke making a deep point or square in front of yoke, having a large collar turning back from it. A cluster of these would be pretty on a pincushion, or doiley, and are just the thing to use in Battenburg lace.

Our illustration of a hairpin case, shows something quite novel and very convenient, especially for traveling. The case measures about 15 inches by 5 inches, and is made of linen in gray, lined with light blue silesia, and over the silesia is white, stiff net. One end of the case is turned up for a couple of inches, thus forming a pocket, into which the larger hairpins are stuck. The other end is finished off with a point and a small loop of narrow ribbon. The small invisible hairpins are run in and out of the net, in the case, and so kept in place and the whole case is folded over several times until it is about the size of an envelope. The outside may be decorated by embroidery or by a conventional design in water color, and a small button should be put on over which the loop fastens. This is a small, flat article when filled and folded, and so takes up little room in a hand bag, and it does keep track of the hairpins in a most admirable fashion.

The land near Amsterdam, Holland, is particularly soft, and when first reclaimed, is almost impossible to cultivate, owing to the danger to the horses of sinking in it sufficiently to break their legs. Although exceedingly productive during its first year, the farmer is usually compelled to allow it to lie fallow for two or three seasons, that it may become sufficiently hard to bear the weight of the horse. An ingenious fellow has lately overcome this difficulty for himself, and reaped a valuable harvest by so doing. He accustomed his horses, during the winter, to moving about with broad pieces of lumber fastened to their feet, and when spring opened he boldly set forth with his horses shod in this way, to the cultivation of his wet, soft land. His neighbors scoffed and jeered, but he went serenely on, and was able, at the end of the season, to show a purseful of money as the result of his experiment. His neighbors now wish that they had followed his example.

CONDUCTED BY AUNT SARAH.

THE ART of carving should be mastered by every man, and women would do well, also, to be well up in it—for when the head of the house is absent it of course falls to the housewife to do this, and of course she should be able to do it gracefully and well, as she does everything else.

Thomas J. Murrey, an authority on carving, gives us the following suggestions:

In the first place, the carving knife must be sharp; it is impossible to carve otherwise,—though of course the meat may be hacked off—and the temper of the carver should be preserved at all hazards.

The carver should of course have a chair that is higher than those used by the rest of the family, as it is exceedingly awkward to carve when sitting in a low chair before a high table. The carver's elbow should be about on a line with the table. Hold the knife gracefully but firmly, with the thumb extended over the back of the knife, instead of the forefinger, as the control over the knife is much greater.

In carving a sirloin of beef, the thickest end is placed toward you; then run the point of the knife along the flat bone at the right, and cut in about an inch deep; then cut slices from the right side. Roasting pieces of beef such as rump, round and rolled meat, should be carved across the grain.

A TEMPTING MORSEL.

The saddle of lamb is the choicest of spring meats. To carve, a shank holder of some kind should be used. Leading silversmiths make one which is useful and ornamental,—but for those of us who cannot have all the conveniences for sale, a white paper, or small napkin, wrapped around the bone, may be substituted. Cut from the outer side of the leg, and lengthwise of the leg a good sized slice. This prevents the leg from moving around on the platter, and brings the inner or thickest part conveniently before the carver. Hold the shank firmly and cut into the center of the leg to the bone. Slice all from the thickest part before starting on the lower part.

By the term Leg of Lamb we usually mean having the loin attached. If the family is small, cut off the loin for chops and roast the leg which is carved much the same as the saddle.

The carving of a leg of veal is a simple matter. Place on a large platter, the thicker end toward the right and the shank to the left. Carve slices from the thick side of the leg bone first and then from the other side, keeping the face of the joint as even as possible.

The sucking pig is one of the easiest dishes to carve, and yet few men like to tackle it until they have had considerable experience. The pig should be served whole, with the head towards the right hand. First cut off the head and split it in two. Split the body down the back and place the parts on the dish, crackling side up. Cut off the fore legs with blade attached; next cut off the hind quarters and divide the ribs, and serve a little stuffing with each piece. Apple sauce is usually served with roast pig—or a dish of small baked apples.

BRER RABBIT.

The domestic duck is the most exasperating fowl to carve. Place on the platter with the tail towards the carver. Insert the fork in the left side close down to the backbone. First cut three thin slices from the right side of the breast, then cut off the wing, which is only in the way. Continue carving the breast until the wishbone gets in the way. Then carve the other side in same manner. The legs may be served but are not very dainty and are usually left for the servants.

The foregoing applies in a general way to the carving of a goose. The stuffing should not be served, as it is so thoroughly soaked with goose grease.

TO CARVE A HAM.

When a whole ham appears on the table its appearance should first be improved by trimming off considerable of the fat around the edges. To carve a whole ham, make an incision in the thickest part of the ham, down to the bone, and work towards the large end. The knife used for carving ham should be very thin and very sharp, so that the slices will be thin and even. Where a family is small one or two slices may be taken off the ham before it is boiled, to be used for frying.

To carve a canvas-back duck, each guest is supposed to receive half of the plump flesh of the breast—but in families the breast may be divided into four pieces, as otherwise the meal would be too expensive for the ordinary family.

IN THEIR NATURAL ELEMENT.

Place the duck on the platter, breast side up, with the head from you. Insert the fork through the center of the wishbone. Make the first cut along the right-hand side of the ridge, keeping close to it, and cut down to the flat breast-bone; follow this and free the meat from the lower part of the breast and work up to the shoulder and separate the meat there. Carve left side in same manner.

SPRING CHICKEN.

To know when a broiler is fat and juicy, examine the backbone; the greater the amount of fat there, the fatter will be the chicken all over. A roasted chicken is placed on the table with the head from you; the first cut is a slight one on the right breast down to the wing, and without removing the knife the wing is removed. Then the leg is cut off and then the wing and leg on the other side. Cut the breast in two, by separating it from the back; turn the breast and cut it in two from the inside.

One of our readers sent us, some time ago, the following recipes—which are a little out of the ordinary, for which reason we give them:

DAMSON SWEET PICKLE.

"To one pound of damsons put three-fourth pound granulated sugar, half pint vinegar, and mace, cloves, cinnamon, allspice and ginger to your taste. Boil sugar, vinegar and spices together, and pour over the fruit. Scald the syrup every other day for three days; the last day add the fruit and cook until the fruit pops open. It keeps well if good vinegar is used.

DAMSON JELLY.

In making above pickle there is much more syrup made than is needed to cover the pickle. Strain out the surplus and to each pint add one pound of white sugar and boil rapidly till it jellies. It is delicious.

To make good rolls or bread quickly take very sour, thick buttermilk that has stood till all the whey has risen and been poured off. Make a dough as for soda biscuit, except add a little sugar and twice the usual quantity of soda; knead well, make into loaves or rolls, let rise and bake. Mother uses this recipe altogether and the bread is light, sweet and as good as that from yeast."

A LARGE MUSICAL FACTORY.

The manufacture of the American Pianos and Organs by Messrs. Cornish at their immense factories at Washington, New Jersey, is one of the most interesting exhibitions possible. The vast works are really wonderful, and the making of the Cornish American Pianos and Organs can be followed in all stages, and they now build and ship at the rate of 60 Pianos and Organs per day, or 18,000 per annum. We advise everybody to write for the Jubilee Illustrated Catalogue issued by this enterprising and entirely reliable firm; the frontispiece is printed in colors and is a unique reproduction of a celebrated painting representing St. Cecilia and the Heavenly Choir. It will be sent free to anyone addressing Messrs. Cornish & Co., at Washington, New Jersey, and mentioning this paper.

IF all the strange parcels that find their way into the mail bags, one in the shape of a cocoanut is the strangest ever received in the vicinity of Boston, Mass. A parcel of this shape came to the Boston Herald, from a Boston man traveling in Cuba. It was too large to go into the mail bag, however, and was carried by hand to its destination, from the postoffice. Stamps amounting to 26 cents were pasted directly onto the pod, the name and address were written on the nut itself. It came through in good shape, and one could plainly hear the milk swishing around inside.

Silk, be it ever so badly creased, may be restored by sponging with alcohol and water, and afterwards rolled tightly around picture rollers and left to dry for several hours. A clean deal board or table should be used for the sponging, and the application of the sponge should be made with some force so that the creases may become thoroughly wet. Silk should never be ironed.

The most complicated and wonderful typewriter in the world has lately been invented by an American missionary in China. It prints four thousand distinct characters, which number are absolutely necessary for transacting business in the Chinese language. It takes four motions to print each character, but even then much time is saved, for in writing the Chinese characters from two to twenty-five strokes of the brush are required. Each character represents not a single letter but an entire word.

TALKS WITH GIRLS.

Well, dears, the summer months are gone and I hope you have all had a nice cool time with plenty of hammocks and pleasant books and a few beaus, for those of you who are out of your teens and your bibs. The autumn is coming apace and with it we must go to work again, and after all, I think we are happier while we are busy than while we are doing nothing, or doing just enough to keep from going to sleep. But I mustn't talk too much. I have work to do this very minute and let us begin it.

The first letter this month is from Love, Griffin, Ga., and Cousin Love wants to know if after an engagement of three years and two postponements of the wedding she should continue it or stop. Stop by all means. If courtship is thus uncertain and unsatisfactory, just think what marriage will be. (2) Have nothing to do with the jealous man who wants all your thought and company, and gives you only as much of his as suits him.

Sweet Sixteen, Milton, W. Va.—A girl of sixteen might marry a man of forty and the marriage be an ideal one, but the chances are that it would not. There is no rule governing this kind of thing. (2) There is no definite age when man is most "capable of the responsibilities of married life." Some men are so at twenty-one and some are not so at any age. A man of thirty with a competence, good disposition and sense ought to be just right.

Marjorie, Aurelia, Iowa.—It is proper enough for girls of fourteen to accept the attentions and courtesies of young men that girls of twenty might, but it is not advisable. Girls of fourteen ought to be studying and preparing for womanhood.

Inquirer, Pineville, Ky.—Write to Civil Service Commissioner, Washington, D. C., or inquire of your Member of Congress.

Vina B., Storm Lake, Ia.—It is not proper for a woman who is getting a divorce from her husband, no matter what kind of a man he is, to accept the attentions of other men. She should get her divorce first.

A. B. C., Nashville, Ill.—Meet the young man pleasantly, cordially and naturally, and he will understand if he wants to. If he doesn't want to, don't you think you haven't done all that is necessary, for you have.

Debutante, Templeton, Cal.—Other things being equal you may have a good complexion by taking exercise in the open air, and eating, bathing and dressing properly. (2) A girl of seventeen should dress in the simplest way possible at any entertainments she attends. Elaborate party dress is for older persons. (3) I know of no way to treat the man who will neglect his affianced for some other girl, except for his affianced to send him adrift promptly. (4) I can not suggest topics of conversation for you and the young men who call on you. Why do you have callers if you don't know what to talk to them about? (5) Yes, men like to be "fussed over". Make them think they are everything and you are nothing, and they will have the greatest admiration for your good sense, fine taste, and discriminating judgment.

Fay, Windsor, N. C.—No, it is not right for a girl of seventeen to call her sweetheart, "dear", unless she is engaged to him—and she oughtn't to be engaged at seventeen. (2) Really, Cousin Fay, I do not know what a "hun-pup" is, but I should say that it is the young of a hun-dog, if you know what that is. I don't. Ask the slangy young man from whom you heard it.

Eider Down, Worthington, Ky.—It is a pretty little courtesy to thank an usher for a seat, or a conductor, or any one who assists you. (2) There is no rule about thanking an escort for his services. Say anything you think best and when you think best. (3) Have as little as possible to do with the man who tries to be familiar.

H. F. S., Ohio.—A man of twenty-eight is not too old for a girl of seventeen, but a girl of seventeen is too young for a man of any age. Wait until he is thirty-one and you are twenty.

Cathie, Enfield, Ills.—As far as I know, there is no such "nursery" as you ask for. (2) It is proper to shake hands with a man when he is presented if you want to. (3) The camping party is all right if properly chaperoned, and it makes a very pleasant outing.

H. M. K., Saginaw, Mich.—It is difficult if not almost impossible to find remunerative work to do at home. I don't know about the firms asked for, but it is generally wise to know what you are going to get before you spend any money for it.

Peach, Earling, Iowa.—The form of introduction is: Miss So-and-so let me present Mr. So-and-so. You can say "introduce" instead of "present" if you wish. Either one may speak first after the introduction. (2) It is more correct for strangers to speak to each other when facing each other in a crowded street car than if they sat with their backs to each other. Why should it be? (3) The lady should not accept a bunch of sweet peas, however lovely they be, or any other flowers, from a strange man. (4) The most graceful dancers learn in childhood.

E. B., Springtown, Ark.—Cards are not customary at small, informal weddings. Written or verbal invitations will answer and they should be given a week or ten days previously, or even less than that. The bride pays for the cards. The bride's father, mother or a friend should ask the cleryman to officiate. Wear the traveling suit, hat and gloves to match. The brown is preferable to duck or crash.

Rachael, Smoky Row, Va.—It would not be etiquette for the gentleman to tell the lady that her skirt was hanging out of the buggy, so much as it would be the plain, every day, common-sense thing to do. (2) A lady should say "Yes" when asked to go driving, if she wants to go. She should thank the man for taking her after they get back safely.

Pearl H., Wheelock, Texas.—I have lost the addresses, too. Look over the advertising columns of your nearest city papers and write to any music firm for the information you want, inclosing a stamp for reply.

J. W., Hot Springs, Ark.—Wear any kind of dark, plain material for the seashore, getting something rather heavier than ordinary summer stuff worn in the interior. Take about what you would take for a visit of the same length anywhere else, except a heavier garment or two in case of cool weather which is commoner at the seashore than elsewhere.

There now, that is all, and I will say by-by till the glorious month of October comes in its robes of crimson and gold, when I hope to greet you all again.

COUSIN MARION.

PLACER MINES AND MINING.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE usual method of placer mining—the method that has been used by all gold-seekers from time immemorial, was simple in the extreme. The miner merely put some of the gold-bearing gravel in a shallow pan, mixed it with water, and then holding the pan in both his hands, gave it a slight rotary motion, slopping out a little sand at every revolution. The gold contained in the gravel, being heavier than the sand, sank to the bottom of the pan. Of course this could only be carried out on a small scale, and another method was also popular. In this the gravel, or "pay-dirt" as it was called, was poured in a shallow stream over a platform covered with blankets or skins. The gold stuck to the blanket while the lighter sand flowed off with the water.

Another way was to pour the pay-dirt and water into a sluice, catching the gold on ridges along the bottom. In 1852 one of the California miners set up a contrivance on his claim which was destined to develop into the magnificent hydraulic engines of to-day. He built a flume extending from a ditch in the hillside over the ravine where his mine was opened, thus giving the water a head of about forty feet. Here the stream fell into a barrel, from the bottom of which depended a hose about six inches in diameter, made of cowhide, and ending in a nozzle made of tin, about one inch in diameter at the tip. The water rushed through this tube with great force, dislodging the gravel and hurrying it down through the sluice built for the purpose.

The value of this invention was at once recognized and large hydraulic machines were built, with the tubes of iron, capable of sending a stream through a pipe two and one-half feet in diameter and with an eight inch nozzle, with force enough to move boulders weighing over two tons. One of these streams will throw a five hundred pound boulder all around, and would kill a man instantly. The water issues with such force from the pipe that it is impossible to cut the stream with a bar or an axe. There have been cases where miners have met their death by being struck by one of these streams at a distance of one hundred and fifty or two hundred feet from the nozzle.

The great difficulty the mining companies have had to meet is the lack of proper water supply. In order to secure enough water to feed these big engines millions of dollars have been spent in building flumes and reservoirs. In some instances corporations have built from two hundred and fifty to three hundred miles of ditches and flumes, and spent over $2,000,000 before any of the actual work of mining could be done. Some claims otherwise valuable cannot be worked on account of lack of water, while on the other hand a company blessed with a good water supply declared a dividend on gravel that only contained three cents' worth of gold to the cubic yard.

Modern hydraulic mining is carried on with such care and economy that the amount of gold lost in washing is hardly worth considering. The powerful stream is turned on the side of the mountain and the rocks, boulders, gravel, sand and gold all rush down and through the sluice boxes. These are arranged with ridges in the bottom. As the stream rushes on the gold sinks to the bottom, where it is caught behind the "ripples", as the ridges are called. Behind these ripples mercury is poured, which unites with the gold. At intervals, which vary according to the richness of the mine, there is a "clean up." The water is turned off, and the mercury which is combined with the gold there forming an "amalgam", is collected in buckets and the greatest care is taken that none is lost, the miners even exploring the cracks and nail holes in the sluice with silver spoons. The amalgam in the buckets is now well stirred, and as the coarse sand and other foreign substances that have remained rise to the top, they are carefully skimmed off. The amalgam is next strained to rid it from free quicksilver, and is then washed in a hot bath of water and sulphuric acid.

When properly purified the amalgam is put in a retort, and the top tightly sealed, except for a tube leading into a bucket of cold water. The heat vaporizes the mercury, which passes into the condenser, where it again resumes its liquid state and is ready to be used again. When the mercury has all been vaporized the retort is opened, and there is found the reward for all the trouble and work, a cone of pure gold ready for the mint.

Most of the placer mines employ two gangs of men, who work night and day. The profits of course depend upon the richness of the gravel and the expense of operating the mine. In this as in all gold mining there is a strange element of chance, which adds a touch of excitement to the otherwise hard and monotonous work.

Many of the best placer mines to-day are located in Montana, a country so wild that one who has not been there can hardly realize the extent of uncivilized country. A true incident related by a traveler on his way to one of these mines will illustrate this. On the stage-road a miner had been picked up. Two days before, while encamped on the mountain, he heard what he supposed was a panther howling in the night. He reached for his rifle and in stepping out of the door caught the trigger in the tent flap. The rifle was discharged and blew the fingers off one of the miner's hands. He started at once for the nearest town. All night and all the next day were spent in getting to where he had left his horse. Then after riding another whole day he reached the stage road. He rode a day in the stage to the railroad crossing, waited half a day for the next train, which did not reach a town large enough to boast a doctor for another whole day. Five days after the accident happened before his wound could be dressed!

SENT FREE TO MEN

Geo. B. Wright Was Restored to Health and Makes a Generous Offer to Every Sufferer from Lost Manhood.

Gratitude is one of the noblest impulses of the human heart, and in few instances has this fine quality been so conspicuously exemplified as in the case of George B. Wright of Marshall.

Mr. Wright is a merchant and well known citizen of Marshall, Mich., who was permanently cured of lost manhood and nervous debility after declining health for years. He now devotes his life to helping other men who suffer as he once suffered. Mr. Wright offers to send the medical prescription that effected a cure in his case to every reader of COMFORT, who is suffering to-day. All who will write him a letter asking for a copy of the prescription will receive it by return mail free of any charge whatever.

Mr. Wright says no one can appreciate the horrors of lost manhood except he has suffered them. No one can help such sufferers unless he knows a cure and has himself been restored to full manhood. Mr. Wright's case was an extreme case. He suffered for many years. He saw his physical powers go from him as the result of insidious disease until he was reduced to a condition of senility, and the best doctors in the country gave him up to die.

He asserts that his 10 years' suffering, both mentally and physically, was turned to unbounded joy in a single night, through a rare combination of medicines that literally made him young again. It is the prescription of this discovery that his enthusiasm leads him to offer free to any man, young or old, who feels that his animation or the fire of ambition has left him and needs something that will not only brace him up and enable him to be prepared for any undertaking which may present itself, but will restore the parts to their original size and vigor.

There is no question but what in his individual case the results were just as described, and it seems quite probable that any man who believes himself to be weak may profit by sending for this free prescription. Many people wonder how he can afford to send this prescription free, but it costs him little to do so, and he feels a philanthropic interest in giving weak men an opportunity to cure themselves.

A request to G. B. Wright, music dealer, box 810, Marshall, Mich., for his free prescription will be promptly and privately complied with by return mail.

CONDUCTED BY REGULUS.

THE LUNATION or new moon which occurs at about 6 minutes past 2 o'clock in the afternoon of the 4th of October, Washington mean time, the last degrees of the sign Capricorn will be rising and the 18th degree of Scorpio will be culminating. The lunation falls in the 8th house within five degrees of both Mercury and Venus, all in the sign Libra which is the home of Venus. The luminaries so placed are without affliction and are in benevolent aspect even with the malevolent planets.

The general indications of the scheme are favorable, though there will be a continuance of martial activity and strong inclinations towards strife for national interests. The warlike spirit will prevail and there will be some unusual contention through diplomatic channels. The malefics are all elevated but highest of all is Jupiter the "Greater Fortune", and the antagonistic inclinations of the government will be tempered by his emanations in ways that are just and benevolent though possibly severe in execution. Jupiter has just passed the south meridian, and in that position the ancients tell us the "king and superiors shall be good and shall honor his or their people and do justice generally and impartially and they shall thrive under their government and be successful."

The great malefics indicate some dissension among politicians over Congressional matters or with reference to continuance or succession in office. The lunation in the 8th house, notwithstanding it suffers no affliction, suggests a warning to the female members of the families of the principal executive authorities of the government, indicating a serious affliction if nothing worse, of some lady of prominence among the first ladies of the land. Some unusual fluctuations in the stock markets are to be looked for from the 7th to the 12th, when also the monied institutions have some flurries of excitement or adopt some measures creating some disturbance in monetary circles.

Mars overtakes Jupiter about the 10th of the month and there is likely to be some unhappy development in church affairs or a religious dispute which provokes public comment, nor would it be strange if there should be some popular indignation or excitement over atrocious acts towards Christians in foreign climes. The conjunction of those two planets is to be attended with earth tremors or disturbances in the vicinity of Turkey and Arabia.

The lunation is likely to give some periods of unusual heat with heavy mists and fogs with showers, in the first ten days of the month, though altogether the times are both healthful and pleasant.

CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR OCTOBER, 1899.

OCTOBER 1—Sunday. Avoid the society of eccentric persons and do not engage the mind in metaphysical discussions or antiquarian researches; the day is peculiarly mischievous for digestive troubles and for acceleration of diseases of the liver and bowels; the evening is active and energetic and improves matters in all directions, especially those of a social character.

2—Monday. Be up betimes; be active and diligent in business and urge all honorable pursuits to the utmost; deal with bankers, judges, lawyers and persons of means and prominence; seek money accommodations and buy goods for trade; all in the early part of the day; the afternoon is less to be depended upon and surely ought not to be used for any transaction concerned with land or buildings; nor should any new matter be inaugurated after three o'clock.

3—Tuesday. The forenoon is not auspicious for any of the great moves in life and the pennies will need to be watched that they do not "take to themselves wings" needlessly or fruitlessly. As the noon is passed, however, give all thine energies to the prosecution of literary and artistic matters; do important correspondence and travel; have social and musical entertainments and look for pleasure from the drama.

4—Wednesday. The day is promising and business of all kinds should be urged to the utmost; preferences may be given to such as depend for success upon mental labor; the afternoon is especially favorable for literary matters and for prosecution of mathematical and scientific studies; let contracts affecting legal and educational matters be made; merchants and tradesmen are particularly favored.

5—Thursday. Another day of excellent promise, inviting travel, business activity, and enterprise; the fine arts are encouraged in an eminent degree and architectural and horticultural matters should be pushed vigorously; purchase goods for trade; have money transactions; bargain for houses and lands and deal in such commodities as wood, coal, lumber, grain, and articles of decoration and apparel.

6—Friday. Continue thine efforts of yesterday with renewed vigor in all matters except such as concern houses and lands; the evening is mischievous, so have care not to become involved in any kind of controversy nor be hasty in anything said or done; see that nothing like inflammation results from thine acts of the evening, congestion or hæmorrhoidal troubles will be easily aggravated then; be not careless with fire nor in handling animals.

7—Saturday. This day begins auspiciously; choose the forenoon for having thy money dealings and adjusting accounts; buy merchandise for trade and inaugurate enterprises concerned with literary work, books, publications, illustrations, and all artistic pursuits.

8—Sunday. Not a favorable Sabbath day but one likely to be marked by depressing experiences and more recommended for rest and quiet than for any active operation of mind or body.

9—Monday. The first two-thirds of this day should be vigorously used for pushing all thy ventures, particularly such as are to be conducted by the aid or through the intervention of persons in public office or those in authority; the evening is evil and promises disappointment or disagreeable hindrances in matters then begun; do not use the time in any important matter if it can be avoided.

10—Tuesday. The very early morning is the best part of this day, especially for all contracts of a commercial nature or that appertain to the elegant pursuits, literary ventures, and the pleasures and gratifications of mankind; as the noon is passed, however, more than usual caution ought to be used in any money transaction, nor should purchases be made for trade during any part of the succeeding twenty-four hours; some bad financial misfortune is likely here. See that all chances for fire or explosion are guarded against for we are now in the midst of days promotive of combustion and conducive to bad losses therefrom.

11—Wednesday. Be in no haste to begin the labors of this day, especially if it be the commencement of a new venture; but give the preference to the afternoon, when urge thy business with manufacturers, machinists, chemists, and all persons concerned with machinery, drugs, chemicals, metals, cattle, etc.

12—Thursday. Avoid litigation, especially over trademarks, patents, and literary productions; use the pen very cautiously; engage in no important transactions with printers, booksellers, stationers, mathematicians, lawyers or public writers; nor can much advantage be expected from dealings in such goods as pertain to the ornamental or decorative in life; art labors or enterprises inaugurated during this day are not likely to yield benefit or profit commensurate with effort or expense and are likely to meet baffling and annoying experiences; keep out of disputes in the evening.

13—Friday. Use the forenoon fully for all general business but as the afternoon advances conditions render unsafe the major money transactions and caution all against too hasty judgment or speech, when also care should be had that the temper or excitement does not make loss of means or cause injury to the best interests; look out for fires and explosions.

14—Saturday.—Affairs commenced at this time have the best promises of success, unless the nativity of the person is now very evilly disturbed. REGULUS recommends that the day be fully improved for all the honorable undertakings in life; that special efforts be given to all enterprises pertaining to the scientific pursuits and such as are concerned with the elegant occupations or polite arts; the day is peculiarly fortunate for courtship and marriage, also for the purchase or sale of wearing apparel and fancy and ornamental goods; authors will find the forenoon of this day excellent for commencing new and important work; make applications to officers of large corporations or government officials for favor or advancement.

15—Sunday. Avoid the aged and eccentric in the forenoon; the afternoon is peculiarly favorable for the religious exercises appropriate for the day.

16—Monday. More likely to be a "blue Monday" than otherwise; avoid thy landlord in the morning nor have any dealings with contractors, miners, farmers, and persons engaged in the laborious and dirty avocations; do not make any beginnings nor look for much permanent progress or advantage from thine efforts during the forenoon; be watchful of the purse in the afternoon.

17—Tuesday. Make applications to public officers or persons in authority for favor or promotion; railway officials and government employees are more agreeably disposed and more readily confer favor.

18—Wednesday. The forenoon encourages dealings with the laboring classes and promotes advantage from transactions with plumbers, tinners, and building contractors also from dealings in artistic wares and furnishings or apparel; do not apply for favor from government officials, politicians, superintendents of public works nor any of the eccentric persons in life during the middle hours of the day; urge correspondence in the evening hours when the literary labors generally may be more easily conducted than usual.

19—Thursday. The musical and artistic pursuits and the literary and elegant occupations generally suffer annoyances and embarrassments on this day; the day is peculiarly evil in most respects and prompts the postponement of very important beginnings; enter into no contract of any kind but especially is the time to be avoided for wooing or wedding; engage no servants nor expect much progress from any of the literary undertakings.

20—Friday. An evil day; discouraging for the purse and embarrassing to the progress of enterprise; conditions are threatening and money transactions have but little, if any chance of success; inducements may be held out for speculation, but REGULUS advises his friends to beware of temptation; litigation and heavy loss, if not bankruptcy are likely to fall to the lot of a great majority of those who embark their capital on this day; avoid dealings with mechanics, chemists, dentists, surgeons and manufacturers.

21—Saturday. Do not travel or change residence on this day; public officials and railroad employees will be short of patience; have no transactions pertaining to patents, trademarks, or any of the novelties of life; very aged and infirm persons are best avoided.

22—Sunday. Not promising for Sabbath day; the brain and nervous energies are just now suffering considerable detriment and nervous diseases will be greatly quickened for a time; seek rest and quiet on this day which is unusually depressing.

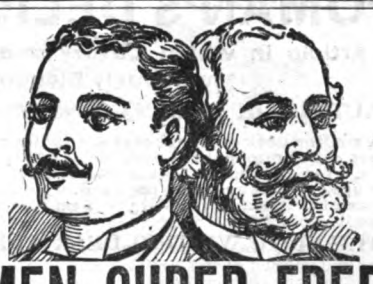
23—Monday. A vein of evil is mixed with what would otherwise be very benevolent conditions on this day and somewhat embarrasses or frustrates the undertakings of the time; make no bargains for houses or lands; defer consultations with architects and builders, and dealings of importance with stone cutters, masons and persons in the dirty avocations.

24—Tuesday. For authors, musicians and artists this is an especially fortunate day; let all engaged in the polite arts improve every moment urging and realizing from their several pursuits; purchase merchandise for trade and have important money transactions. The day is full of courage and enterprise inducing increased business activity and a healthy venturesomeness and REGULUS specially urges his friends to improve every moment; the merchant, tradesman, commercial traveler and all in the literary pursuits or having employment concerning books or upon the press are particularly favored; let the day be taken for inaugurating the principal ventures of the passing time.

25—Wednesday. This day should be fully improved in the pursuit of all general business but especially for dealings with druggists, chemists and mechanics. It is very favorable for all in the mechanical pursuits or who employ fire or sharp instruments in their callings.

26—Thursday. This is one of the excellent days of the month especially for inaugurating important matters connected with art, music, fancy goods, articles of adornment and the beautiful and elegant in life; seek audience with the ladies and have the social gathering and musical or dramatic entertainment; deal with eccentric characters; consult ancient authorities and have dealings concerning rare and antique articles.

27—Friday. Be cautious in the use of the pen during this day; make no contracts, engage no help, nor expect favor from lawyers, judges, or persons generally in the literary pursuits; the judgment will prove faulty and mental productions are best laid aside for future consideration and revision; do not sign any money agreement and hold on to the purse-strings.



28—Saturday. Begin this day early and actively pursue thy several avocations, giving preference, if any, to the literary and artistic pursuits; seek favor from thine employer in the afternoon and evening.

29—Sunday. A favorable Sabbath day, encouraging lofty sentiment and elevating religious discourse, and clergymen have happy influences to assist them in their labors and in advancing church interests.

30—Monday. The morning hours are baffling and important matters are best deferred until a more favorable time; the middle hours of the day encourage the literary pursuits; in the evening hours seek the society and advantages from manufacturers, mechanics, chemists, military men, surgeons, and traders in metals and cattle.

31—Tuesday. A very favorable day generally for the pursuit of business and especially for dealings with public officials and persons of prominence in large corporations; also for antiquarian researches and the study of uncommon or occult subjects.

It takes the moon 29 days, 12 hours and 44 minutes to make a revolution around the earth.

"THE LIGHT THAT WON'T GO OUT."

Every family in America is ready to buy "The light that sells on sight"—the wonderful new invention called ARC-LIGHT WICK.

It burns a whole year without trimming. It kills a candle, discounts kerosene, beats gas, and almost equals electricity or sunlight.

It saves 20 per cent. of oil. It's clear, white and brilliant. It's the light that won't go out. It's the light in the window for thee.

The Light That Sells On Sight.

Copyright, 1896, by Morse & Co.

The ARC-LIGHT is something new. All need it, all buy it, all bless it. To show it means to sell it, and it yields from 100 per cent. to 300 per cent. profit to agents.

The same kind of carbon that gives the electric light its brilliancy is woven into the Arc-Light by a patent process. We hold affidavit showing that an Arc-Light burned 1040 hours, giving the last hour the same perfect, brilliant, light it gave the first.

A single lamp manufacturer in New England, who bought over 35,000 writes: "The Arc-Light beats all others. It sells our lamps, and turns night into day." Every home, store, hotel, saloon, hall, church, or car company will buy the Arc-Light Wick on sight. We have made arrangements with the manufacturers to introduce this wonderful discovery, and we offer for 60 days the following wholesale terms to agents:

Medium or A wick, 5-8 inch wide—the size for house lamps—by mail, sample 5 cents; per dozen, 25 cents; per gross, $2.50. Small or E wicks, for hand lamps, lanterns, etc., 3-8 inch wide, sample, 5 cents; per dozen, 25 cents; per gross, $2.50. Large or B wicks, for table, bracket lamps, 1 inch wide, hall, store, or sample, 5 cents; per dozen, 25 cents; per gross, inches wide, for incubators, $3.50. HA! HA! HA! FUN ALIVE!

The Comical Mirror.

A handsome convex mirror in a case suitable for carrying in the pocket. For many years the funniest and most laughable attraction in nearly every museum has been the large convex mirrors in which a person appears drawn out as long and narrow as a bean pole, or flattened down like a gridiron with a face as broad as a cellar door. This mirror produces the same effect as the large and expensive mirrors in the museums. By holding the mirror in an upright position stout people look thin and in a horizontal position thin people look stout; anyone can recognize themselves at once, but their features are so distorted and their general appearance so changed that they cannot fail to have a good laugh over it. If you have a friend (lady or gentleman) who think they are a little better looking than anyone else, let them take a peep into the mirror and it will take them down a peg or two—either the "short and fat" view or the "long and slim" view are stunners and will cure the blues every time. Send for one it will afford you lots of fun.

GRAND OFFER TO YOU. Send us 12 cents and we will send this splendid literary monthly for the Home, three whole months on a trial subscription and one Comical Mirror, postpaid; for 27 cents we will send you the paper 3 months and three mirrors all paid; or, for only 76 cents we will send the paper a whole year and one dozen mirrors by express Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

A $5.00 SHAVING SET FOR ONLY $1.49.

TEN MILLION MEN WILL SAVE $250,000,000.

The average man saves about twenty-five dollars a year by shaving himself and by having a good outfit, you can take comfort enough and save dollars enough to carry you over many rough places in life. We have tried to get up a practical shaving outfit for many years, but the expense of fitting out a suitable case of bang-up A No. one tools has been so great that not until a visit to Norway and Sweden revealed the fact that Swedish Razors were now the best in the world and the makers were anxious to prove it to the American people could we do so. Thus we bargained for a large lot of the best quality at very low figures. By getting the goods from different countries and buying in large lots, we have made up a case of great value at very small cost. These outfits come packed in cases eight inches long, six inches wide and five inches high. The combination consists of 1 Royal Steel Swedish Razor, single value $3.00; 1 Genuine, Horsehide, Double, Reversible, Canvass-back, Nickle-hung, Ebonized Handle Razor Strop, value $1.00; 1 Real China Shaving Mug; 1 Cake Star Shaving Soap; 1 Best Bristle, large handle Lather Brush; 1 Cake Perfumed Lump Magnesia; 1 Stick rich perfumed Cosmetic—making a grand $5.00 combination, all packed in a compact case ready for shipment. We estimated that nearly every man in the country out of necessity shaves himself at some time or other during each month and one long wait in a barber shop sometimes costs more than this whole outfit is valued at. Every man should have an outfit in the house for emergency's use at all events and we have thus got it together at a low cost so as to be able to offer the best articles at the lowest cost. Every woman should see to it that either her Father, her Husband, her Brother or her Sweetheart has one of these outfits. They make the best presents one can give to a gentleman, and you can get one free as follows: Send a club of five yearly subscribers to this paper, at 25c each and we will send an outfit all charges paid, or send $1.49 in cash and we deliver it free—extending your subscription one year.

THE LADY'S SYRINGE.

This Syringe we recommend as the simplest and most perfect Vaginal Syringe in the market. It is made of soft rubber, and consists of the nozzle, vaginal shield and a bulb. The vaginal shield is the essential feature of the instrument. It is constructed in such a manner that when the nozzle is pressed against the vaginal inlet it closes the latter so perfectly that when the bulb is pressed upon, the injection enters the vagina and expands all its folds which harbor the discharges to be removed. As long as the bulb is pressed upon the injection is held in contact with the entire mucous membrane, and is removed the moment the bulb is allowed to expand By repeating the injection and withdrawing several times the vagina can be more perfectly cleansed than can be done by any other instrument. This is a bonanza for wide-awake lady agents who can sell them in every house, as they give perfect satisfaction to every lady using them. They are so simple that their merits and perfect work are easily explained satisfactory by one lady to another, and every lady buys one at once.

NOTICE TO AGENTS.

A Profitable Business

FOR MEN AND WOMEN WHO ARE WILLING TO WORK.

$3.00 a Day Sure.

DEAR READER:

If you are out of work, or are not satisfied with your present business and would like to make more money, it will be to your interest to read this notice. We do not offer you a chance to make a fortune without work, but we do offer you an opportunity to make money much faster than you can make it at any other kind of work. The country is flooded with circulars offering chances to make money at the rate of from twenty to fifty dollars a day; such offers are not business-like, and all agents who amount to anything are disgusted with such circulars, and most of them are thrown aside without being read. If you are looking for an opportunity to make twenty to fifty dollars a day, you might as well throw this notice aside also; but if you would like to engage in a good paying business, you will do well to read this notice through carefully. Then you can use your own judgment as to whether our offer is a reasonable one or not.

We guarantee that anyone who is willing to work can make from $3 to $5 a day at this business. We admit that $3 to $5 a day is not much of an inducement when compared to the statements made by some firms, who offer all the way from $20 to $50 a day for selling various articles. We do not make you such glowing promises, but what we do offer you has the advantage of being true. We might offer agents a sure chance of making from $20 to $50 a day, but the chances are that anyone who would believe such unreasonable nonsense would not know enough to earn his board at any kind of business. That is not the kind of agents we are in quest of; we want reliable agents with common sense, who are willing to work for good pay, and not those who are looking for an opportunity to make a fortune without work. We believe the only way to get such agents and keep them, is to furnish them with a good thing to sell, a real genuine bargain, and then to tell them the exact truth about the business. We have a large number of agents at work, and we know for a certainty what working agents can make. We know that $3 a day is the very lowest; most of our agents are averaging $4 and $5 a day, and often some of them make a good deal more than that. We have several agents who are clearing from $7 to $10 a day. But these are great workers operating in the best territory, and, of course, everyone cannot do as well, but it is easy for anyone to make, at the very least, $3 a day above all expenses in any territory. We haven't a single working agent who is clearing, on an average, less than $3 a day. Now, be sure that you understand us: We don't say that lazy, shiftless agents will make $3 a day, for they can't do it at this or any other business, but what we do say is that agents who are willing to work, not too hard, but the same as they would expect to work at any other business, can easily clear $3 a day above all expenses, in any territory, and if they have good territory to work in they can make anywhere from $5 to $7, and even $10 a day. If you want a good chance to work and get good pay for it, you will find it to your interest to read this notice through carefully.

The articles which we have for you to sell are a line of forks, spoons, etc., made of a new metal called "Brazil Silver." We will describe this new line of goods the best we can, then you can judge for yourself whether we are offering you a good chance to make money or not.

BRAZIL SILVER.

Warranted for Twenty-five Years.

Brazil Silver is believed to be the very best metal in existence for the manufacture of forks and spoons; it has all the lustre and brilliancy of burnished coin silver, and is much harder and more durable, in fact, it is impossible to wear it out. It is absolutely indestructible. The goods made of this metal are the same all the way through, there being no plating to wear off they will remain as good as new for any length of time. For all practical purposes in the manufacture of table ware this Brazil Silver is superior to coin silver. It is as lustrous and as pure as coin silver, and being much harder it will wear even longer than silver; in fact it is absolutely impossible to wear it out. It will wear forever. As there is no plating to wear off, the metal being the same all the way through, it stands to reason that you can't wear it out. Our confidence in the metal is so great that we guarantee it to wear twenty-five years. We give a guarantee signed by the company warranting the goods to wear and to give perfect satisfaction for twenty-five years. We are an old, strong and thoroughly established firm with ample capital to carry on our business and make our guaranty as good as the Bank of England. In selling these goods an agent can recommend them with the greatest of confidence, for they are just as represented, absolutely indestructible. And, furthermore, our guarantee warranting the goods to give satisfaction for twenty-five years, clears the agent from all responsibility in the matter; for if any article fails to give perfect satisfaction, no matter how long it has been in use, we hold ourselves ready to refund the money paid for the article. These goods are the same metal all the way through; they will never wear out. They always wear white and bright. We give a guarantee signed by the company, warranting every piece of Brazil Silver to wear twenty-five years. You can sell these goods to your best friends with perfect confidence, for every sale is as much a benefit to your customer as to yourself.

Working with goods that are warranted to wear and give satisfaction for so long a time as twenty-five years, and by a Company, too, whose capital is sufficiently large to make their guarantee good for almost any amount, is an advantage which no other firm is prepared to offer. If you want to make money fast now is the time to do it. If you think that five-dollar bills are good things to have, now is the time to get them. Never in the history of the agency business have agents had as good a chance to make money rapidly, and it is reasonably sure that they will never have another chance like it.

It is easy to make from $3 to $5 a day at this business.

All Marked with Initial Letters, Without any Extra Cost.

Among all classes there has always been a strong desire to have their table ware marked with their initial letter, but on account of the heavy expense of having it marked only a very few have been able to afford it. Heretofore the cost of artistically marking table ware has been even greater than the cost of the goods; now, by our new methods, we are able to offer these elegant Brazil Silver goods, all marked with any initial letter desired in the very highest style of the art, without any extra cost for marking. These Brazil Silver goods, even if unmarked, would be the greatest bargain ever offered the public in table ware, but with the additional and highly desirable feature of being all marked with beautiful and artistic initial letters, these goods are not only great bargains in table ware, but are the greatest bargains of any kind that have ever been offered to the public through agents or in any other way.

The people are always ready enough to buy what they want when it is presented to them in the form of a genuine bargain. Well, here is absolutely the greatest bargain every offered, and the agent who works with it will find that what he has is earnestly desired at nearly every house he visits; it is easy to get orders when you can offer great bargains, that the people really want and can afford.

It is easy to make from $3 to $5 a day at this business.

Table and Dessert Knives.

Our knives are made of the finest tempered cutlery steel and are triple plate, in other words every dozen knives is plated with 12 dwt. of pure silver and hand burnished. Our knives are of the highest grade, fully equal to Rogers' or any knives made. These knives will not wear as long as Brazil Silver goods, but they will wear as long as any knives made. We guarantee them to wear ten years in constant use. If not in constant use they will wear proportionately longer. We give a guarantee, signed by the Company, warranting the knives to wear and to give perfect satisfaction to the purchaser for ten years. As knives are usually used in families they will wear much longer, anywhere from fifteen to twenty years. They are fully equal to Rogers' knives and only cost about two-thirds as much. It may seem strange to some that we can sell so staple an article as silver plated knives at such reduced prices, but we are doing it. It is our way of giving the public good, solid value for their money. We are saving our customers about one-third of the price at which the same grade of knives are sold at the stores and jewelers. Any one who will take the trouble to compare our knives and prices with triple plate 12 dwt. knives sold at the stores and jewelers, will be convinced of the truth of our statements. We are making a profit, of course, but our unequal facilities and immense trade make it possible for us to undersell all competitors, and our customers are getting the benefit of the lowest prices known in the silverware trade. We are not only selling at greatly reduced prices, but we also guarantee every article to be exactly as represented and to give perfect satisfaction to the purchaser, or money refunded.

The First Thing to Do.

If you decide to accept the agency, the first thing to do is to send to us for the agent's case of samples, which is the most complete and perfect case of samples that has ever been prepared for the convenience of agents. Our complete and perfect case of samples is not to be compared with anything that has ever been sent to agents before. It contains the very best and most salable articles in the world. There is nothing in the market that agents can sell as fast and sell as easily and make as much money out of, as they can the goods contained in this splendid case of samples, and everything is arranged and explained so that any agent can't fail to understand just how to go to work to make a great success of the business. As soon as you receive the case of samples you are ready for business. And if you are willing to work you are just as sure to make from $3 to $5 a day as the sun is to rise. Take the case of samples and canvass your territory according to the directions sent with the samples, until you have taken orders for the amount of goods you are prepared to send for. Then order the goods from us and fill your orders, and so continue.

The Magnificent Case of Samples Which We Furnish to Agents.

Reckoning the above samples at our lowest retail prices they amount to $2.83 1-3. We furnish them to agents nicely put up in an elegant sample case or roll, for only $1.00, which is $1.83 1-3 less than they amount to at our regular retail prices. This is less than one-half of the retail value of the samples, and much less than they cost us. The sample case or roll, which the samples are put up in costs us nearly as much as we require you to send for the samples, case and all.

Wholesale Prices.

Wholesale or agents' prices and all necessary information for carrying on the business will be furnished with the Outfit. Remember we make everything plain to you about wholesale prices, methods, etc., when we send you the Outfit.

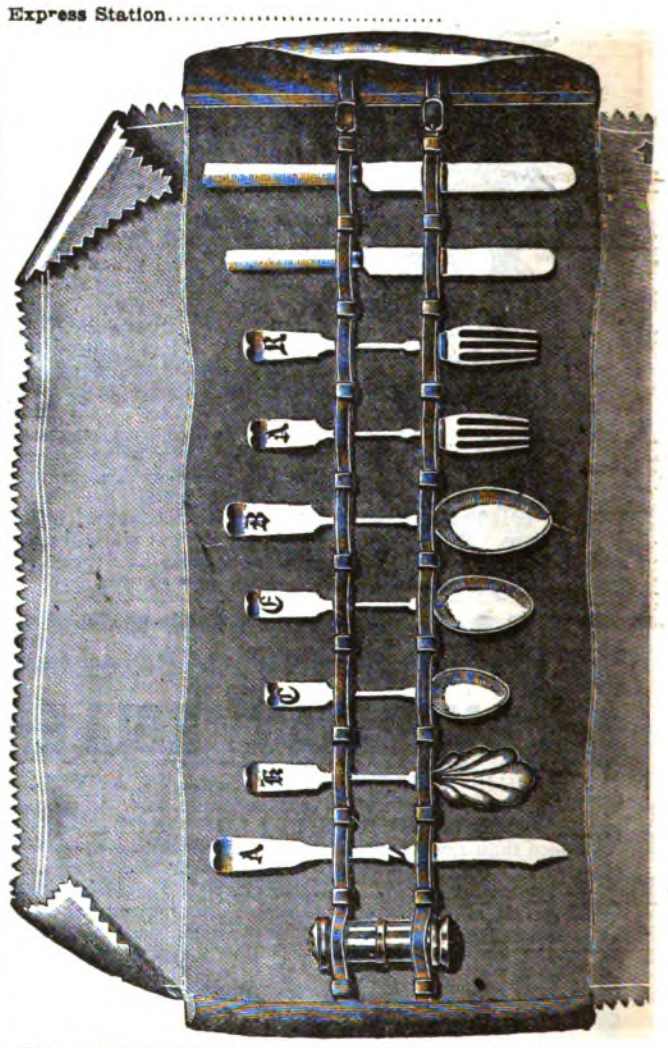
VERY IMPORTANT.

The business we are offering is straightforward and honest in everyway, shape and manner. Our goods are in every respect, just as we represent them to be. The Outfit we furnish our agents is exactly as we represent it, and is always sent the same day the order is received, just as agreed. We have tried to state these facts so they could and would be believed and still we are constantly receiving letters from parties who would like to engage in the business and would do so if they felt sure we were telling the truth and would do as we agree. Many of these doubters have been cheated and are not altogether to blame for doubting; the most of them say they think we are honest, they say we talk honest, but as they have already been swindled they don't feel like risking even one dollar and so, although our business is in every respect just as represented, and we always do just as we promise, we lose the services of a great many agents and they lose the benefit they might derive from the business because they are afraid we may not be telling the truth. Now, to overcome this spirit of doubt, we have decided to send Samples to all who wish us to do so, C. O. D., with privilege of examination at the express office. It costs us from twenty-five to forty cents more to send the samples this way, as we have to pay that amount for return charges on the money, but we are willing to do it and so prove to all that are interested that the Outfit and our goods are just what we claim. If after reading this notice you think you would like to give the business a trial, but wish to see the Sample Case before you pay the one dollar cut out the following printed form, fill it out and send it to us and we will send the Outfit to your express office prepaid, and give the express agent instructions to let you thoroughly examine the Outfit, then, if you are satisfied that we have told the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and are also satisfied that you can make money selling our goods, you can pay the express agent one dollar and take the Outfit. If you are not satisfied, you can refuse to take it and the agent will return it to us. No other firm has ever made such an offer. We have adopted this plan in order to convince the most skeptical and to secure the services of all the good working agents in the United States.

(CUT OUT THE FOLLOWING FORM.)

Form to be Signed by those who wish us to send the Outfit C. O. D. with Privilege of Examination.

ROYAL MANUFACTURING CO., DETROIT, MICH.:



GENTLEMEN—Send the Outfit by Express, C. O. D., with privilege of examination. If I find the Outfit just as you say, I will pay the one dollar required and give the business a fair trial, but if I am not satisfied that the Outfit is as good as you recommend it to be, I shall refuse to receive it. Now, remember, the understanding is that I am not to take the Outfit unless I, myself, am satisfied that it is all right. It must all depend on my own judgment. If I am satisfied, I will take the Outfit; if I am not satisfied, I shall not take it and shall not pay the one dollar If you want to send the Outfit with this understanding, send it along C. O. D., with privilege of examination.

This cut shows the Sample Case or Roll, and how the samples appear put up ready for business. The Roll is made of highly finished waterproof canvas, and lined with soft flannel goods. The samples are held in place by strong straps. The whole rolls up and fastens with a leather strap which is firmly fastened to the back of the Roll. This is the most practical arrangement for carrying the samples that could be thought of. When rolled up the Case is compact and easy to carry. When open the samples show to the best possible advantage, making a good impression at first sight. This Sample Roll gives a business-like appearance; it is substantial and handsome, and invariably gives the impression that there is something valuable inside. All are anxious to see what it is you are carrying around with such care. This is of importance as it secures attention and interest at the start. There is nothing like having your samples put up in a business-like shape; it gives a favorable impression from the start, which is half the battle. It is the same in all matters. A store that looks like business attracts customers; while, from a shanty store, you would not, as a rule, expect the best things. The fact is, in the agency business, as in every other business, you must have things fixed up just right if you expect to succeed. Our Brazil Silver Goods are the best that have ever been offered for the price, or anywhere near it. The new feature of being marked with beautiful and artistic initial letters, free of cost, is the greatest popular hit of the times; and the Sample Roll is arranged so as to show the goods off to the best possible advantage. Furthermore, we carefully teach every agent just how to take advantage of all these splendid qualities and popular features. Is it any wonder that our agents succeed better than those who are working for other firms?

We Prepay all Express Charges on Everything. We pay the charges on the Outfit and on all goods ordered. Remember, we pay all express charges.

COURAGE AND COURAGE.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY R. B. HILL.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

AFTER the last fight before Santiago a group of Rough Riders were discussing the bravery displayed by our troops as compared with that of the Spaniards, and finally courage in general became the theme of conversation.

"I believe there is courage and courage," said a cowboy from the western plains. "I believe some men are brave under certain circumstances, and what is commonly called 'cowardly' under others, in fact——"

"I don't agree with you," said another. "In my opinion if one is really brave the emergency is all that is necessary to cause its exhibition. This was expressed by the little lad, who, when asked on a certain occasion how he could act so bravely, replied, "It wasn't me; it just braved itself." And so, too, if one is cowardly, it is just as sure to display itself."

"Well, in a general way I rather agree with you," said the first speaker; "still I know of one instance to prove the truth of what I have said, and I suppose there are others."

"That so?" said the other. "Let us have it, then. I'm always willing to descend from the abstract to the concrete. Tell us about this strange anomaly—who and what he was."

"His name was Bruce Anthony. He put in his appearance on the plains about four years ago, and his initiation was like this: A crowd of us, headed as usual by Big Jim Todd, dashed into Saloonville, as we called the place, whooping and yelling and shooting off our guns. We had three months' pay in our pockets, and meant to have a good time. When we went into O'Shea's bar one of the first things we saw was this young tender-foot, sitting quietly in a corner. Todd pounced on him like a coyote on a lamb, and ordered him to set up drinks for the crowd. He did so, but declined to take one himself. If anything this was worse than if he had refused to 'set 'em up,' and the way Todd villified and abused him was pitiful; at least, the way he took it was pitiful. He was as pale as death, his lips trembled and he could hardly stand. At last Todd wound up by knocking him down with his fist. When he got up he was like a different man, and looking Todd straight in the eyes he said as calmly as I'm talking now, 'I hope you are through.' 'I may be and may not. Why?' replied Todd taking a step backward, and dropping his hand on the butt of his six-shooter. 'Because this is very unpleasant—to me. I came west in search of friends, employment and health, and I must say I have received sorry encouragement thus far as regards the first, and the blow I've just received is not conducive to the last; hope, however, to succeed better in the third. Can any of you tell me where I can find Mr. Frank Gordon's ranch?'

"'What do you want to know that for?' asked Todd.

"'I have a letter to him from one of his schoolboy friends asking him to give me something to do.'

"'We belong on Gordon's ranch,' answered Todd, 'and we don't want no such cattle as you around. We've got no use for scrub stock. And if you're looking for good health you'd better go somewhere else; your health at Gordon's would be mighty bad while it lasted, and we don't need you, anyway.'

"'I must try it, though,' said the young fellow; 'perhaps I'm not so green as you think. Of course I can't ride and shoot like you fellows, but I have some foundation to build on in both cases.'

"And this proved to be true, for Mr. Gordon seemed glad to see him and give him employment. He proved himself to be a good shot and rider, as they do those things in the east, and in a few months he was one of the best all-round cowpunchers on the ranch, and no man in that whole section—not even Todd— was quicker or handier with his six-shooter. We put him through a tough experience, but he never shirked a duty or a danger, and at the end of a few months we had all learned to like him mightily—all except Jim Todd. He was assistant foreman, and never missed a chance of brow-beating and bullying Anthony. Time and again I've seen him stand pale and with downcast eyes while Todd abused him; then next thing he'd be taking his life in his hand and doing something reckless. Several times we saw him do such things as we had never seen Todd do. And he never did or said anything that would make a woman blush.

"I said we all learned to like Bruce except Todd, but there was another notable exception, Miss Lucy Gordon, or 'Lucy' as I called her, for I knew her from a baby almost and have held her before me on my horse many a time. From the first she ignored Bruce's existence, and I knew Todd had told her what had happened in the saloon. She didn't know what fear was herself, and such a thing as cowardice in a man she could not tolerate for a moment. Todd was madly in love with her, and though I knew there was no chance for him, he and some others seemed to think there was.

"So things went along for about two years, when I noticed that Bruce who was of a happy bright disposition, began to droop and lose spirit. We two had become very chummy, and I got after him about it, and when he told me what the trouble was I felt like a fool for not having guessed it long before.

"'Idiot! Fool, that I am! I am in love with Miss Gordon,' he exclaimed; 'I, whom she calls that poor coward! Whom she has seen humiliated time after time by that—that red-headed, black-hearted brute Todd. As long as I could be near her, see her occasionally I could stand the fact of her ignoring me; but now that passive contempt is turned into active scorn, I cannot bear it; I am going away. And oh, Sid, when I am gone, don't let her marry that fellow. I'm not worthy of her, I know, but neither is he. I try to be, and he does not. You have known her so long, you have influence with her; keep her from it!'

"I told him I couldn't answer for a woman's whims, but that I didn't think there was any danger of her marrying Todd. Then I asked him the direct question, why it was he cringed before such a man. 'Ah! Sid,' he replied, 'I know that you, like she and the rest, consider me a coward, and perhaps it is natural; but I like to think, God grant that I am right in thinking, that with me it is a natural infirmity as cross-eyes or hair-lip would be. Each of my grandfathers killed a man, my father narrowly escaped doing the same thing. I believe I was born with a morbid horror of taking human life. It is not the feeling of being hurt, you have seen enough of me to know that, but a single dread of being overcome and of taking the life of a fellow-man. And yet, although you will doubtless find it hard to believe, the fact that I came near killing a man was the immediate cause of my coming west. For years, indeed from the days of our boyhood, he had treated me much as this Todd has since my coming here, and I never resented it. At last one day he attacked a much smaller, weaker man, and seemed on the point of killing him, when I sprang to the rescue, and ere I knew it had seriously injured him. And I feel that this spirit is latent within me. I have longed for this fellow to give me an opportunity of the same kind that I might redeem myself in her eyes, but it has not come and I can wait no longer. I have notified Mr. Gordon of my intention to leave at the end of the month.'

"I tried to dissuade him, but could see that his mind was fully made up. Before going west I had studied law, and during that period and afterwards I had studied human nature pretty closely. While Bruce was talking the question suggested itself as to the why and wherefore of Lucy's change of attitude toward him. If her contempt had passed from the passive to the active state, what had caused it? Was it not because she felt that she was becoming interested in him, and her woman's pride rebelled at the change? This was the conclusion I reached, and the next day I put my conclusion to the test. Making the opportunity to be near her, I said:

"'Bruce Anthony tells me he is going to leave us the last of the month.'"

"She started and the color left her face as she asked falteringly, 'W-h-y?'"

"'You are driving him away, and if you will take the advice of an old friend you won't let him go.'

The color flushed her face now and her eyes flashed, as she exclaimed:

"'What possible difference does his going or remaining, make to me, do you suppose? What interest can I have in a pitiful coward like that?'

"But even as she spoke the word her lips trembled and tears filled her eyes. 'Oh! if he were only brave! Only brave!' she moaned, wringing her hands.

"'Brave' I retorted, 'Take him altogether he is the bravest man I know—too brave to think or say aught disparaging of women; too brave to take advantage of another man's infirmity or disease to make him suffer.'

"Then I told her what Bruce had told me, and when I left her I hoped for the best. Of one thing I was sure—she loved him, but which would win, love or pride, I could not say.

"I did not tell Bruce what had occurred, but urged him not to leave without saying good-by to Lucy, which he had spoken of doing. The day arrived and I saw him ride toward the house to tell them good-by. Little Tot, as we called her, Mr. Gordon's baby girl of four years, saw him coming and running to meet him begged to be taken up for a ride. I saw him bend down and lift her in his arms, and then ride on to the piazza where Lucy was sitting. He dismounted and the child led the horse away to munch the grass. Removing his hat he went up the steps to her side and extended his hand. Before she could take it, had she intended, a horseman galloped up and throwing himself from his horse, strode up the steps. I saw Todd, for it was he, cast a quick glance toward Bruce, before which he stepped back with averted face. Then the other two seemed to ignore his presence altogether, and my heart burned hot within me as I saw him standing there and felt that his last chance was gone, and that perhaps the villain had won.

"So absorbed were we all that we failed to notice a great cloud of dust, which came from beyond, until it was almost opposite the ranch. Then we all saw it at once and realized what it was—the stampede of a great herd of cattle, next to a prairie fire one of the grandest, most terrible sights on the Western prairie. They would pass almost within a stone's throw of the ranch, and merciful Heavens! Tot was right in their path.

"'Save her! Save her!' cried Lucy, springing up and pointing with quivering finger.

"'Too late now,' answered Todd. 'No earthly power could——'

"'Cowards! Will you stand here and see her killed before your eyes? Then I will save her!' and she started forward.

"But Bruce was before her. 'Stay where you are!' he thundered, already half-way to his horse. With a bound he was upon the animal's back and dashing toward the apparently doomed little one. She appeared to realize her danger and ran toward him with outstretched arms. He reached her, leaned down and caught her to his heart, and turned his horse's head—but too late; they were swallowed up in that cloud of dust, cut to pieces beneath those sharp hoofs! No, no! They had disappeared only for a moment. The gallant horseman dashed from the dust-cloud bearing his precious burden safe in his arms.

"'Saved, thank God! O, baby, baby!' cried Lucy, pressing her to her heart and covering her face with kisses.

"'Won't you say good-by now?' asked Bruce again holding out his hand. The girl caught it in both her own, and whispered:

"'Can you forgive me? And—and you won't go away, will you?'

"Softly as she had spoken, Todd saw, heard and understood. 'Curse you, I'll kill you both!' he hissed, his hand going to his pistol. But quick as was hate, love was even quicker, and Bruce's weapon spoke the fractional part of a second the sooner, and Todd for once missed his aim and lurched forward with a pistol bullet through his body. It was all beautifully done and when I got through hugging Bruce he was rather limp."

"I suppose," said one of the listeners, "your hero and heroine were married soon and lived happily together ever after?"

"They were married not very long afterwards and will, no doubt, live together happily to the end of time."

"And what became of Todd?" asked another.

"O, he left for parts unknown as soon as he was able to travel," answered Gordon. "He was a good deal of a hog, it is true, but he knew when he had enough."

"Strikes me that your friend Anthony is rather curiously mixed in his composition, but as you say he is such a stickler for duty and for taking the part of the oppressed, why didn't he come with you fellows? If any people have ever been oppressed it is these Cubans."

"Well, he was very anxious to come, but you see his wife was not in—that is, she wasn't willing for him to leave her just now. I'm looking for an important letter from him now by every mail and if Jepson don't bring me one this evening I'll be disappointed. Here he is now. A letter for me, you say? Many thanks, old boy! This is the one, postmarked about a month ago, and says—in large letters, 'A BOY! His mother and himself doing well. He sends you a kiss.' Well, that's mighty good news, and if I live to return I'll carry him a souvenir."

THE FRESCO OF SAN JOSE.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY MILLICENT OLMSTEAD.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

PERHAPS some of you know that in the near vicinity of San Antonio, where Miss Lathrop and I spent our winter, there is a chain of remarkable old structures called the Missions.

They were settlements of buildings enclosed with a wall chief of which were a chapel and the cloisters, and cells of the reverend fathers who built these oases in the wilderness for the conversion and protection of the tribes of aborigines that roamed the southern wastes.

They were more incredible than one can describe, when one remembers that they were reared in solitudes, the nearest civilization being Mexico or the lower part of California. Yet these edifices were finished in a perfect and magnificent way, the fathers themselves being the civil engineers, architects, stonemasons, carpenters, sculptors and artists during their erection, the farmers, apothecaries, priests and protectors, when once the Mission was complete.

There are five of these Missions, situated from two to four miles apart, extending from the old church of the Alamo in the heart of the city, to the farthest Mission some ten miles away. They were all originally connected by ditches or aqueducts containing clear running water, from which each Mission, as well as the irrigating ditches of its farms, was supplied.

The Alamo itself is not numbered in the chain of Missions, of which the original plan, was, I think, to form links to reach even to Mexico City.

It is with the second Mission outside of the city, about four miles away, with which I have to deal in my tale. This is by far the most luxurious of the five, but it is in a terrible state of ruin. Its vicissitudes have been many, not the least of which was the quartering of United States troops there at one time in the bloody history of the State of Texas.

Once upon a time, (I am going to say that because it is the way all right-minded fairy tales begin, and I cannot know but that you may consider this one.) But let me tell my story, first. Once upon a time, on a Sunday morning, Constance and I set out to view the Missions. We were quite alone that day, except for a willing nag that pulled our phaeton. We could not miss our way, for it was almost a straight road. We did not stop at the first Mission, inasmuch as we had been there before, and had climbed all over it. It is in a comparatively good state of repair, and has a family of market gardeners and florists living in its cloisters, with a duck and chicken yard in an angle of the church, which in a large degree takes from the romantic interest of the place. We drove directly to San Jose.

Now San Jose has lost a large part of its roof. In front of the facade is a Mexican burying-ground, where rude crosses with bead wreaths and much gilding stand tawdrily awry. A few

A PECULIAR REMEDY

Something About the New Discovery for Curing Dyspepsia.

(From Mich. Christian Advocate.)

The Rev. F. I. Bell, a highly esteemed minister residing in Weedsport, Cayuga Co., N. Y., in a recent letter writes as follows: "There has never been anything that I have taken that has relieved the Dyspepsia from which I have suffered for ten years except the new remedy called Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. Since taking them I have had no distress at all after eating and again after long years can sleep well. Rev. F. I. Bell, Weedsport, N. Y., formerly Idalia, Colo."

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets is a remarkable remedy, not only because it is a certain cure for all forms of indigestion, but because it seems to act as thoroughly in old chronic cases of Dyspepsia as well as in mild attacks of indigestion or biliousness. A person has dyspepsia simply because the stomach is overworked, all it wants is a harmless vegetable remedy to digest the food and thus give it the much needed rest.

This is the secret of the success of this peculiar remedy. No matter how weak or how much disordered the digestion may be Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets will digest the food whether the stomach works or not. New life and energy is given not only to the stomach but to every organ and nerve in the body.

A trial of this splendid medicine will convince the most skeptical that Dyspepsia and all stomach troubles can be cured. Send for little book on Stomach mailed free by addressing F. A. Stuart Co., Marshall, Mich. So popular has the remedy become that Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets can now be obtained at any drug store at 50c. per package.

curious Mexicans poked their noses out of their doors as we hitched our horse to a broken railing. They were quite a distance from us, their houses built into the fallen remnants of the stone protection wall. That part of the old pile still roofed over proved to be locked, and so, as we could not get in there, we contented ourselves with peering in through the windows and convenient cracks and crannies. It looked sufficiently spooky for us to glance at each other and whisper:

"Shouldn't you suppose this place would be haunted by the ghosts of the past?"

Then one of us remarked cheerfully and aloud as we turned away:

"Of course it's haunted. It couldn't live up to its pretentions as a real, antiquated ruin if it wasn't."

The old cells, however, were accessible in their half-unroofed condition, and we sat down in one of them, on some blocks of stone fallen from the wall. Gothic arched doorways divided the rows of cells one from the other, and on the crumbling plaster walls, and in the wide arched doorways we found the faded remains of an elaborate fresco work in reds and blues.

As we sat there idly chatting, the soft glow of clouded sunlight drifting in upon us, I noticed a brown film come before my eyes, as I looked towards the doorway. I rubbed my eyes, and glanced away. It was gone. Then I gazed again at the doorway. There was the brown mist again, slightly defined in shape, which seemed to be that of a cowled monk.

I stopped in the middle of the remark I was making, and glanced uneasily at Constance. She was sitting stiff and staring towards the doorway. I looked again. The figure was distinct now, a monk standing in the opening between us and the only exit, the windows being still iron-barred, and the walls too high to scale.

"Constance," I whispered, "Do you see it too?"

She nodded.

"What do you see?" I persisted.

"A ghost!" she gasped.

And there we sat, the creeps running up and down our backs, and the hairs of our heads pricking up like porcupine quills. Yet it was a very plain looking ghost after all, with little appearance of evil intent. He stood profile to us, with his cowl drawn, so that we could not see his face, and appeared to be busy at the wall of the arch.

Familiarity with the apparition at length removed our terrible first fear. We shifted our positions a little, and Constance suggested that perhaps he was real after all.

"Speak to him," I proposed.

And she, whose nerve seemed pretty steady chirped out rather nervously, "Good-morning."

Not a response of any kind from him.

"Humph," we grunted, losing much more of our fright, "Conservative old spook!"

"What do you suppose he's doing?" asked Constance.

So we arose, and hand in hand stepped across towards the spectre. Two steps took us quite near enough, and we could see that he was painting on the faded design frescoed within the arch. His hand traced the curves and sweeps of the pattern with almost magical swiftness, leaving bold strokes of red where the brush passed. In his left hand held downwards like a cup, was a little thick, red paint—paint, was it—I looked intently.

"Constance," I muttered, clutching her by the shoulder, "It's blood!"

We both shuddered, and gripped each other as close as we possibly could.

"Oh, let's get out of it," we murmured quite uselessly. But there we stood, our fear awful again in its paralyzing power.

Steadily from a cut in his wrist the red blood ran drop by drop into the cup of his hand.

Suddenly the apparition spoke. "Do not fear me," it said; but our fright only doubled, and I nearly shrieked.

Constance held my hand firmly.

"And do not hinder me, for oh! I have so short a time," went on the voice. It seemed scarcely to shake the still air, so breathless, so rarified it seemed, yet reaching our hearts if not our ears with the certainty of the vibration of a violin string. And, it was a woman's voice, by all that is mysterious! Even as I thought this, she turned and the hood dropped away from her face. Of all the beautiful sights I ever beheld, that face was the loveliest, if the most unearthly. The white of it had the transparency of some pure marbles, with blue eyes shining with the depth and fire of sapphires, and bands of pale hair bound in strand after strand around her head.

"I can only come once in your year," she murmured, "and my work is far from done."

Her remarks came in snatches, as she worked on relentlessly.

"My vow was to finish the frescoing of this church. I vowed—and I must accomplish. I was alone here, in this wild and desolate place. The fathers sent me. They did not know I was a woman. I was only an artist—I wore monk's robes. I made a vow and it holds immortally. I was jealous of the church—I loved a man. Do you know how it is to love—to love—to love?" she cried louder, glancing at us over her shoulder, almost scorn in her eyes as she implied our ignorance.

A FAMILIAR VERDICT.

"KILLED HIMSELF IN A FIT OF DESPONDENCY."

A Theory of Suicide Sustained by Medical Evidence.

Is there any relation to be traced between the prevalence of "stomach trouble" and the prevalence of suicide "while in a despondent state of mind?" That is a question which only an observant person would ask, but, being asked, it suggests a very important field of inquiry.

Every dyspeptic knows what it is to feel that dull cloud of despondency settle down on the mind as a fog settles down on the sea or wraps itself about the mountain climber. The blue is wiped out of the sky, the green fades from the grass, the sun is blotted from the heavens. There is a sense of fear and dread of impending danger. Forms seen through this fog of the mind are magnified and distorted, looming large and threatening like the scepter of the Brocken. It's a miserable feeling; miserable for the sufferer, miserable for his friends and for his family. Does that condition of depression ever come to a man or woman without causing the cry in the secret heart,

"I WOULD THAT I WERE DEAD?"

And if the condition becomes more frequent, the rifts in the fog more rare, does not the thought of self-destruction haunt the depressed mind? Like some evil peeping face which flattens itself against the window and watches us as we eat, like evil eyes that burn through the darkness of the sleepless hours and hold the gaze in terrified fascination, so this thought of self-destruction haunts the despondent mind and, like the ghost of Banquo, "will not down."

These are facts. They are common facts. Is it any wonder that some day in such a fog of mind, haunted and hounded by this one thought of escape from a life of misery, the man sends a bullet into the aching heart and stills it? He may be rich, his family may adore him, his friends may be legion. But through the fog of this depression he sees poverty stalking him. His "foes are those of his own household," he thinks, and those who call him friend are plotting his ruin.

is a common result of a diseased condition of the stomach and organs of digestion and nutrition from which the dyspeptic suffers. There is a relation to be traced between suicide from despondency and the despondent condition of the mind so common to the victim of "stomach trouble" in some of its forms. In the large correspondence of Dr. R. V. Pierce, chief consulting physician to the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, Buffalo, N. Y., the feature of mental suffering is always prominent in the letters of those who are seeking a cure from diseases which affect the digestive and nutritive system. This will be noted in the letter which follows:

"I was afflicted with what the doctors called nervous indigestion. Took medicine from my family physician to no avail. In looking over one of Dr. Pierce's Memorandum Books," writes Mr. Thos. G. Lever, of Lever, Richmond Co., S. C., "I found my case described exactly. I wrote to you and made a statement. You sent me a descriptive list of questions, also hygienic rules. I carried these out as best I could but I thought myself incurable, as I suffered so much from pain under my ribs and an empty feeling in my stomach. At night would have cold or hot feet and hands alternately. I was getting very nervous and suffered a great deal mentally, thinking that death would soon claim me. Always expected something unusual to take place; was irritable and impatient, and greatly reduced in flesh. I could scarcely eat anything that would not produce a bad feeling in my stomach. After some hesitation, owing to my prejudices against patent medicines, I decided to try a few bottles of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery and 'Pellets.' After taking several bottles of each, found I was improving. I continued for six months or more, off and on. I have to be careful yet, at times, of what I eat, in order that I may feel good and strong. I fully believe if any one suffering with indigestion, or torpid liver, or chronic cold, would take Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery and 'Pleasant Pellets' and observe a few simple hygienic rules, they would soon be greatly benefited, and with a little perseverance would be entirely cured."

IT DOES NOT SURPRISE US

to see some implement made by man do the work it was made to do. We'd be surprised if it failed. Once in a while some ambitious Darius Green invents a flying machine that will not fly. Once in a while some Keely motor refuses to "mote" to any practical purpose. But for the most part the things contrived and invented by man do just what they were made to do; the saw eats into the resinous log, the rudder steers the battleship, the fuse explodes the charge which topples down tons on tons of ore.

Why should it be any wonder then, that Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery cures diseases of the stomach and other organs of digestion and nutrition? It was made to cure just these diseases, and the wonder would be if it failed to cure. It is not a cure-all. It often cures "liver trouble," "heart trouble," "head trouble," "nerve trouble," "lung trouble," and many another ill that troubles the human body. But it cures these forms of disease remote from the stomach because they really root in the stomach. When the stomach is cured the heart, liver, lungs, brain and nerves, whichever organ may be affected by the stomach is cured through the stomach.

IT'S NO EXPERIMENT

to use Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery for the cure of diseases of the stomach and other diseases originating in a diseased stomach. The cure follows almost as an arithmetical certainty. It's almost as sure that "Golden Medical Discovery" will cure as that two and two make four. We say almost as sure, because as a matter of record two people in every hundred do fail of a perfect cure. But the ninety-eight people in that hundred who use "Golden Medical Discovery" fairly and faithfully, are perfectly and permanently cured.

The record of cures made by Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery covers a period of more than thirty years and the treatment and cure of more than half a million people.

Sick people are invited to consult Dr. Pierce absolutely without fee or charge. All correspondence treated as strictly private and sacredly confidential. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y.

A TEMPERANCE MEDICINE.

The fact is especially underscored that "Golden Medical Discovery" is absolutely and altogether a temperance medicine in the most extreme meaning of the term temperance. It is as free from opium, cocaine and all other narcotics as it is from whiskey and alcohol in every form.

There is no substitute for "Golden Medical Discovery." Let no mercenary merchant impose on you with a remedy which will pay him better but which will not cure you.

"Yes, I loved him—but he gave his love to the church. Do you know how I felt?" She lifted her hands with such a gesture of woe, that the little cupful of blood spattered out upon the wall.

While waiting for the slow dripping to refill the little cup, she turned to us.

"That was my sin and I must make expiation. My confessor said, my life to the church for being jealous of it. Think! It held all that I loved, so I vowed to give my life to it, to decorate the walls of a church, for I had a knowledge of art beyond many artists. I was sent here, here where I learned he was to come in charge of the Mission."

The little cup was filling now, and she fell to work again.

"I had finished all but this cell. This was to be his. Ah, I worked till my red paint failed. Months' journeys to the nearest city in Mexico, no one to send, and he was coming in a fortnight. 'It shall be done,' I cried. I opened a vein in my arm, and used the blood for the red. It lasted until I saw my work almost complete, when my strength gave way. . . This doorway was still undone. . . The fortnight waned; my strength was at an end. If I did not finish I must come again and again from the life beyond the flesh until my vow was completed."

The figure was wavering from side to side; the brush fell from the bloodless hand. We strained forward to hear her last words.

"I was dying—when——he——came."

She fell, but not before we had sprung to her side and together caught her in our arms. We sank to our knees with our singular burden, and only then found another figure kneeling at her side, with one arm under her. It was another monkish form, that of a man, whose face drawn with anguish we could just discern beneath his hood.

Our hands touched him as we clasped the artist; a smile flickered at her lips for one exquisite moment and then, before we could recall our fright or amazement in the presence of such strange sights, they had slipped into the ether within our hands, and we girls knelt face to face clasping each other.

We rose to our feet beneath the doorway. The design in blood was already brown and dry as if years had rubbed its color from it.

Then we saw that the design was complete. She had fulfilled her vow!

As we came again under the open sky an aged, tottering Mexican woman was patting our horse's nose. She gave us a sharp look from her black eyes and held out her withered hand. We did not meet her glance nor speak to her, but dropped our coins in her palm, and drove away with our fantastic memory undisturbed.

A KING OF THE FOREST.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY AUBERTINE W. MOORE.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

LIONS of all sizes, colors and degrees have been encountered by military men in Algerian campaigns, but never beneath African or any other skies has the king of beasts appeared under aspect more fantastic than in an adventure related by Captain Grimblot, a French army officer.

The scene is located in the heart of the desert, near the oasis of Onargia during the campaign of 1869.

Captain Grimblot, with his aid Ben Dris, the Arab chief, commanded the advance guard of an important expedition. Round about them lay an immense plain, dotted here and there with hillocks sparsely overgrown with dry heather, prickly shrubs and stunted brush wood.

Since early morning the men had been marching beneath a sun that towered like a devastating conqueror above their heads. Their skin was parched. Their tongues clove to the roofs of their mouths. The air seemed on fire.

Suddenly one of the Turkish guards, or Spahis as they were called, exclaimed:

"Captain! My captain! A lion!"

"Where?" asked Captain Grimblot.

"Yonder—to the right—not 50 metres distant."

"Captain! I am going to shoot him," the Spahi added presently.

"You shall do nothing of the kind," said the captain, peremptorily.

"But, Captain," implored the Spahi, "I shall be dishonored in the eyes of all my comrades if I do not salute him with at least one ball."

"Spahi," said the captain sternly, "you are under military rule. I forbid you to fire at present. Keep the beast well in sight but do not dare to raise your weapon without my orders."

Then leaving Ben Dris in command, Captain Grimblot hastened to inform the commander-in-chief of the unexpected encounter.

Soon the first regiment glowing with eager anticipation had drawn up before the free monarch of the wilds, that responded to the excited cries of the men by blinking his eyes, so it seemed, and faintly moving his tail.

"Come, my men, you have had your turn," cried the commander, and gave orders to move onward.

As the second regiment drew up in its turn the lion still remained apparently unmoved at what was passing before his eyes. White-robed Arabs and the clanking of armor were doubtless no novelty to him. Cavaliers in red and blue could not be every-day objects to him and yet even they failed to disturb his imperturbable repose.

One of the cavalry officers, a skillful draughtsman, reining up his horse proceeded to sketch the noble animal. By this time the lion was seen standing proudly erect. With unflinching gaze he regarded the draughtsman, whose eyes were fixed steadily on his. Then with an air of regal dignity, he moved grandly toward the column confronting him.

Apparently the armed force that was spellbound at his approach was ignored by him, so completely did his attention seem riveted on the cavalry officer whose gaze evidently fascinated him.

All at once there rang along the line the command: "Present arms!" In face of the wall of sharp, glittering bayonets here presented, the lion paused bewildered.

Still facing the men he assumed a crouching posture, as in defiance. Nothing more superb can be imagined. Then column after column of infantry, cavalry and artillery passed before the lion as before a majestic king, respectfully saluting him. The king of the desert followed their manœuvres with every sign of interest, and his great shaggy head nodded as in token of approbation.

As the last battalion came directly in line with the splendid animal, one of its gallant officers, St. George de Marcilly, yielding to an unconquerable impulse, seized his fusil from the servant who always bore it, and taking aim was about to fire. In an instant a sentiment of sympathy took possession of him as overpowering as the warlike impulse that had previously guided his movements, and returning his fusil to his servant he exclaimed:

"No, it would be a shame to slay so noble a beast!"

At this juncture the spahi, no longer able to contain himself, raised his weapon and fired at the lion.

Great was the surprise of all present, as the smoke cleared away, to see the lion unharmed and undisturbed in his place. Moreover there appeared at his side a lioness with her three cubs, and he bore himself as their natural protector. It was most mysterious.

While everyone that beheld the sight was filled with wonder and awe, a monstrous sheet of water became unexpectedly visible, extending before the army far as the eye could reach. The sun's rays played on its surface with dazzling splendor, and the heated atmosphere seemed to spread a red and white canopy above it. Lion, lioness and cubs had all disappeared, and the army moved forward over the very spot where they had seemed to stand.

The entire expedition had been duped by the fantastic forms of a mirage of the desert.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY F. E. BURNHAM.

"BOUT half a cup, Miss; I've only got three cents."

The speaker was a tall, well-built, though emaciated young man who sat uneasily at the kitchen table, watching a young girl who was pouring a cup of tea. He was a soldier, a Confederate, who had seen and experienced the terrors and privations of war.

"I guess a full cup, or two full cups will do you no harm," said the girl handing the soldier a brimming cup of tea; "put the change in your pocket."

"No, I guess they wouldn't do me any harm," said the soldier shrugging his shoulders, "but most folks expect cash for refreshments about these parts, and money's a scarce article, at least with the likes of me.

"I had money, though," he added, as though fearing she would take him for a deserter; "went up to Clayville and gave the old folks a lift, and that is all I have left."

"You are in danger here," said the girl, glancing out of the window; "only this morning a company of Union soldiers passed. You know what it means to be caught."

"They're after me now," replied the soldier, gulping down a great swallow of tea. "I have been dodging them for a day and a half. Their horses are pretty well done for, however, and I have managed to keep out of their way."

Suddenly the girl uttered a startled cry, seizing the soldier's arm and dragging him to the window.

"See," said she, "they are coming now."

A company of horsemen were advancing; the horses seemed used up.

The soldier grabbed his cap and started to run, detained, however, for an instant by the young woman.

"Run to the barn and saddle the horse if you have time; if not, then ride him bareback; start when I shut this window."

Meanwhile the horsemen were approaching, and presently they drew up before the door, from which the Confederate had departed a moment or two previous, passing unobserved to the stable, the gloom of the early evening hiding him, crouching as he did to the weatherbeaten house.

"Have you seen anything of a 'reb' about here?" demanded the lieutenant, addressing the young woman who sat by the window.

"Yes," replied the girl, speaking slowly, "yes, there is a Confederate here."

The lone soldier in gray had begged her to deceive the horsemen, declaring that she had seen nothing of him, and she promised—promised to help him out of the trap into which he had fallen. Instead, she had affirmed that he was there.

"A tall, broad-shouldered fellow, with dark moustache?" queried the lieutenant, eyeing the girl sharply.

"Yes, and he came from Clayville," replied the girl frankly.

"That's the man we are looking for," said the officer, smiling at the young woman's evident simplicity.

She had carelessly dropped a large Union flag over some sewing which she had been working upon—a flag which she had been repairing for her brother. The officer had noted the quick movement and it had excited his curiosity.

He dismounted and stepped into the room, followed by the handful of men who had come with him in search of the Confederate.

"A friend of the 'Blues' yet harboring a 'reb'?" said the lieutenant, a puzzled look spreading over his face. "What have you under the flag, Miss?"

The girl's foot moved under the covering, though the darkness concealed the agency, the movement of the flag, however, being clearly seen.

"What have I here?" replied the girl, demurely, "my sewing, to be sure; what did you suppose?"

The officer advanced and attempted to toss the flag to one side.

"Do you not believe me?" demanded the girl, almost fiercely. "I told you I had sewing here; please to keep your hands off, sir."

The lieutenant whistled softly. Again the flag moved perceptibly, and the soldiers saw it.

The lieutenant attempted to seize the corner of the flag, but the girl stepped quickly before him, grasping his wrist.

"The man who insults me by doubting my word, insults that flag," cried the girl, her eyes flashing. "I love that flag and I have told you the truth."

The officer angrily wrenched himself free, at the same time unsheathing his sword, viciously running it through the great flag.

"Come out of there, you 'reb,'" he cried, hoarsely.

The girl stood apart, watching the lieutenant, a peculiar light in her eyes; suddenly she burst into a rippling laugh.

"Now will you believe me, sir?" she demanded, her eyes sparkling.

One of the soldiers laughed and the rest followed suit, the lieutenant smiling in spite of himself.

"Where is that 'reb?'" he demanded, the blood mounting to his face.

"There is no rebel here," replied the girl.

"You said there was when first I spoke with you," said the officer.

"So there was, sir, then," retorted the young woman, "but he rode away when I closed that window."

The officer paused for a moment before the girl, undecided what to do; then, removing his cap, he held out his hand.

"You have done well, Miss," said he, "accept my congratulations."

Bravely the girl looked into the officer's eyes.

"I will tell you why I helped him to escape," said she, her voice trembling. "I love this flag sir, and it was not the rebel that I helped to escape, but the man. He had been up to Clayville to give his father and mother his quarter's pay, braving the danger of being captured. I thought him too brave and good a man to fall into your hands, sir."

"And he will not," said the officer, smiling. "He has too much the start of us, boys," said he, turning to the soldiers. "About face!"

Two days later a barefooted darkey, his face wreathed in smiles, rode up to the homestead of the young woman who told the truth, when a lie might have seemed the best means of accomplishing her end.

"Boss say fo' me to brung dis yere hoss up from yonder," said he, showing his ivories. "He say dat he was much 'bliged, an safe inside de lines."

A SNAP SHOT.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY WARD GOULD.

Copyright, 1899, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

THE Gordons were very much exercised over the fact that some one was making, almost nightly, depredations upon their woodpile. With wood costing four dollars a cord, they didn't feel that they could afford to supply unscrupulous neighbors with fuel; but what exasperated them the most was to think that anyone should have the nerve to come within the shadow of their house and steal wood, as you might say, from under their very windows.

Several times Tom Gordon had himself remained stationed at a back window all night long with a loaded shot gun in his hands; but upon each of these occasions nobody had come, while perhaps, on the very next night someone would leave a large irregular cavity in the woodpile. There was no way of locking the shed for it had no doors; the front being open. The situation was getting desperate. That something would have to be done at once was very apparent.

Tom Gordon was one of those men usually known as a mechanical genius. He was always working upon some mechanical contrivance. Always upon the verge of some great invention. When Johnny was a baby, he had made a device by which the cradle was rocked with power furnished by the windmill on the roof. This worked very nicely for a time, and allowed Mrs. Gordon to attend to her housework while the baby was mechanically lulled to sleep. One day a sudden wind storm came up, and they found Johnny wedged under the sofa, while the cradle was a total wreck. This was only one of his many labor-saving inventions. When Tom Gordon began to think along mechanical lines, he usually evolved something, and when he took up the matter of the wood thief, Mrs. Gordon knew that something would be very likely to happen.

He spent the whole forenoon in considering the matter of mantraps, etc., and finally hit upon a scheme, which he concluded would not only be effective, but would at the same time afford a grand opportunity for the exercise and display of his ingenuity.

He had, of late, among other things, gone into amateur photography, very much to the discomfort of his wife, who had to give up her best closet for a dark room, and to put up with many other things which would be a sore trial to any housekeeper. So far he had not proved himself a success as a photographer. Notwithstanding that he had the family in an almost constant state of posing, with every possible variety of grouping and posture, and in all possible places, he had succeeded in making but one picture which was considered worthy of display in the parlor. And even this one, though the plate had gone through a combined bath of many chemicals, and was cooled down by a Russian bath of ice water, was, very much to the relief of the subjects, fast fading out. And yet, in spite of his many failures, it was the camera that he was going to depend upon to expose the villain who was stealing his wood. He spent the afternoon in the wood shed, where he placed the camera in such a position on one side that it commanded the entire front of the wood pile. He then stretched a wire across the shed, from side to side, directly in front of the wood, so that no one could approach without encountering it. This was connected with an electric battery. He then arranged other apparatus in such a way that the moment anyone pressed against the wire, several things would happen simultaneously. A revolver loaded with a blank cartridge would be discharged, the shutter of the camera would be opened, and an electric spark would ignite an extra large charge of flash light powder, which was placed near the camera on a pie tin. The revolver was not absolutely necessary, but it would furnish a dramatic effect and an artistic finish which was very gratifying to the would-be inventor; and would at the same time act as an alarm to awaken him when the exposure was made. He felt very well satisfied with the arrangements, and was impatient for the time to arrive when the apparatus should be given a chance to accomplish its purpose.

In the next yard to the Gordons and separated from them only by a board fence, was the residence of Father Gifford and his good wife Martha. The Reverend Gifford, though called father, was the pastor of an Episcopal flock and low church at that; but he was such a kindly, fatherly old man, that all who knew him delighted in giving him the title and he seemed to like it.

Promptly at ten o'clock the old man proceeded to lock the doors and windows before going to bed, as had been his custom for years.

"Now Pa," said Martha, "before you lock the kitchen door, be sure to call kitty in."

He opened the kitchen door and called long and loud, but no kitty came.

"Kitty won't come, Martha. I believe we shall have to leave her out tonight."

"Pa Gifford, if kitty is left out I sha'n't sleep a wink tonight. It would be a cruel shame to leave her out in the cold, and if you don't go out and find her, I will."

When Martha spoke that way, there was but one line of action open to Father Gifford; so he submissively put on his hat and went into the darkness in search of the truant pet.

"Kitty, kitty, kitty." There was a faint answering mew from the darkness.

"Come, kitty, come into the house." She ventured a little closer; he could just see her eyes and her little white paws.

"Come kitty, let me take you to your nice warm bed."

He advanced cautiously and tried to take her in his hands, but kitty evidently thought the old man had come out for a frolic, for she gamboled about with enthusiastic delight. The old man advanced slowly and kitty retreated gracefully until they had gone quite across the yard to the fence. Kitty went through the fence into the Gordons' yard, and looked back at her aged pursuer with triumph, as though she would challenge him to climb over. Father Gifford leaned over the fence and appealed to her with so much of heartfelt earnestness in his voice, that none but a feline could have resisted. But she, obdurate, stood looking saucily at him, lifting first one dainty paw and then another. She realized her advantage and revelled in it. She arched her little back up and rubbed back and forth against a tree, in happy appreciation of the old man's predicament. For just a moment the old man wavered, but the thought of Martha, back in the house, spurred him on, and he began to climb over the fence. It had been many years since he had attempted a feat of this kind, and as he let himself slowly down, on the other side, and disengaged the tail of his long clerical coat from the sharp end of a protruding nail, he congratulated himself upon the darkness.

Kitty, greatly amused at these proceedings, and highly gratified with herself at having enticed the old man over the fence, started out again in search of new exploits. Father Gifford now warming up to the occasion, quickened his pace, and even attempted a moderate sprint across the Gordons' back yard. Kitty bounded on ahead in high glee. The old man made a spurt as they neared the wood shed and pushed her pretty close; but she dashed into the shed and was up on top of the wood pile, like a flash. The old man, with arms extended, approached with caution, while kitty backed into the farthest corner. Seeing that she was being cornered, with very little chance of escape, she changed her tactics, and assumed a fighting attitude. With tail erect and eyes flashing, her back humped up to the very top of the shed, she stood hissing and spitting. Her body was all swollen up with rage, and Father Gifford, as he drew nearer, was wondering how her little skin could stand the pressure, when, suddenly, there was a loud report, a blinding flash, and the air was instantly filled with smoke.

Father Gifford burst into the presence of his wife, breathless and excited.

"For the land sake, Pa Gifford, what is the matter with you?"

She, too, had heard the report and was at a loss to account for it.

"Where is kitty?"

When he had recovered himself sufficiently to talk, he said:

"Martha, dear, I am afraid we shall never see our little kitty again. The last I saw of her she was standing on a wood pile, puffed up to a most unreasonable size; then there was a terrific explosion and that was the last of kitty."

"Ezra Gifford, what do you mean by coming here and telling me a story like that? Who ever heard of such a thing as a cat exploding? You must be crazy. Where have you been?"

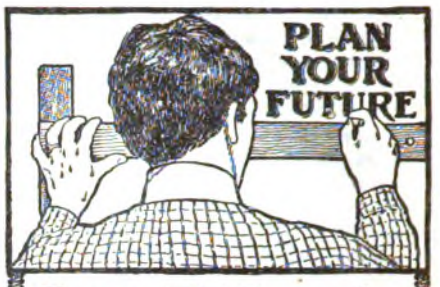
"I can't help it, Martha, I have told you the plain truth and I can take you over in the morning and show you right where it happened."

But Martha would not be convinced. She could not believe that her dear little kitten would be so foolish as to blow herself up.

When Tom Gordon heard the report of the revolver, although he had gone to bed, he hurriedly dressed himself and ran out to the wood-shed. But by the time he arrived upon the scene everything was quiet again and there was no one in sight. He took the camera into the house and nearly all night long he was working in a subdued red light, with chemicals and baths.

When the first faint streaks of day lighted up the eastern sky, he had his printing frame out ready to catch the first rays of sunshine. As the sun mounted higher and higher into the heavens, he made frequent and impatient visits to the slowly developing picture, and with each visit he became more and more excited. Finally when he could contain himself no longer, he called to his wife:

"Amy, come here, I've got a picture of the wood thief, and I want to see if you recognize him."



She cast one glance at the picture and then looked at her husband in blank astonishment. "Of all things! Who in this world would have thought that Father Gifford, of all men, would do a thing like that?"

But there was the evidence unmistakable. Tom Gordon had made the picture of his life. There was the Reverend Father Gifford with hands outstretched, in the very act of taking wood from their woodpile. The likeness was perfect. There was the venerable countenance, the gray beard and hair, and the clerical attire. There could be no mistake. Father Gifford was proven a wood thief.

"Tom, there is some one at the door. See who it is."

When Tom opened the door who should he see but the very culprit himself, looking as sweet and innocent as a new born babe.

"Mr. Gordon," said he, "did you see any pieces of a black and white cat around your wood-shed this morning?"

FREDERICK AND THEREABOUTS.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

"Summer's the time for fun."

So sang Grasshopper Green in the song, and so in their hearts sang the members of the National Geographic Society as the long train bearing them and their friends for a "field-day" in Frederick and Braddock's Heights, Md., pulled slowly out of Washington, D. C. They were following, as nearly as possible, the route taken by General Braddock and his troops when he came over from the mother country to quell at a blow, as they fondly thought, the French and Indian war. Alas, how mistaken they were! With no more knowledge and cunning than a babe of two years, with no experience of the difficulties of crossing these American wilds, they devoutly believed that it was only necessary for them to show their haughty heads and brilliant scarlet uniforms and victory would perch at once upon their banners.

In imagination we saw the proud old General meeting the convention of Colonial Governors in Alexandria, or Belhaven, as it was then called, on April 14, 1755. In imagination we listened to the plans for the pacification of the Indians of the Six Nations, and for making them presents. We hear the governors striving to persuade General Braddock to alter his proposed route to Fort Du Quesne, and we see the self-confident and obstinate old man stubbornly refuse to alter his plans one whit at the suggestions of those whom he considered far below himself in knowledge and ability. We know him to have been an honest and upright man, and the shrewdest and most skillful of all of England's military tacticians—a man who in ordinary warfare had not an equal—but we smile over his complete ignorance of the methods of Indian warfare, and we watch him with feelings of foreboding as he marches his troops out of Belhaven, and goes into the first camp of his journey at Rock Creek, near the present city of Washington.

As we steam along in the cars we follow as nearly as may be the track of the English army of one hundred and forty-four years ago, though, as we pass through the thriving towns and villages, and see the evidences of prosperity and wealth on every hand it is hard to realize that less than one hundred and fifty years ago most of this country was a howling wilderness through which the army was obliged to cut its way.

At length we reach Frederick, where is still standing the "tavern" where Benjamin Franklin, then postmaster-general for the English Colonies in America, and George Washington, newly appointed aid-de-camp to Braddock, met for the first time. This tavern is now, as then, a one storied log house of two rooms and a loft above, with a big, old-fashioned chimney at each end. It is now inhabited by negro families, and is fast falling into decay. One can but regret that such should be its fate. So important a relic of our country's history ought to be preserved from ruin.

In the old barracks, then Braddock's headquarters, and which are still preserved as one of the ancient landmarks of Frederick, was concerted between Braddock and Franklin a plan for forwarding despatches to and from Braddock's army. Here also was discussed between them the question of the provisioning and transportation of the army through the wilderness between Frederick and Fort Du Quesne, and here Braddock let fall expressions of his deep displeasure with the colonies of Pennsylvania and Maryland for their refusal to advance funds for these purposes. Here Braddock purchased of Governor Sharpe of Maryland a magnificent coach and six horses for his own personal use in crossing the wilderness, and which he deemed necessary for the proper upholding and display of his dignity and authority, notwithstanding the difficulties of the path which he knew lay before him. Here Franklin magnanimously offered to be responsible for the procuring of a sufficient number of wagons and horses for the transportation of supplies, ammunition and men, which offer he fully carried out, as he induced the farmers of Pennsylvania, by his influence and adroitness, to spare to the soldiers one hundred and fifty wagons with four horses to each wagon, together with fifteen hundred saddle and pack horses. This action of Franklin's was of the greatest assistance to Braddock, but nearly proved the financial ruin of himself, as, after the death of the old general, he had no means of paying for them except from his own pocket, until finally General Shirley, Braddock's successor, came to his relief. Besides all which Franklin supplied him Braddock forcibly seized servants, horses, wagons, teamsters, carriages and carriage horses in and around Frederick to such an extent that the contractors who were building a new court house there found it difficult to procure teams to haul their materials. In these old barracks, too, Franklin urged upon the doughty general words of temperance and wisdom as to his encounters with the wily Indians, telling him that they would not wait his arrival at Fort Du Quesne, but would sneak along his difficult pathway, lay ambuscades, and harass his slender line to extermination long before he could reach the fort. He reminded him that his line, as he had planned it, would be exceedingly slender, and nearly four miles in length, thus offering a fair target to the arrows of the Indians, and that they knew every turn and fastness of the wilderness into which the army was about to penetrate, and could thus easily sever the line into small parts and so destroy it piecemeal; but to all his arguments Braddock turned a deaf ear, and every American knows the sad result.

In the streets of Frederick we found a procession of trolley cars waiting to take our party to Braddock's Heights, twenty miles away; and we clambered in, watched by an admiring crowd which had assembled to behold us. The beautiful modern buildings of Frederick, and the trolley cars with their motormen and conductors had drawn our minds back to 1899, but as we made our way through the outskirts of the city we were so amazed at the display of slat-sunbonnets offered us that we became bewildered and imagined ourselves again 'way back in "ye olden time." Every visible female (and their name was legion), whether in the house or on the street, peered at us from the depths of one of these pasteboard and gingham monstrosities, which, both in color and decoration, belonged to a far-past generation. The sight of an old stone tavern, with its outbuildings also of stone, massive and time-defying, and all evidently more than a century old, which we passed at a street corner, aided the illusion.

Our way now lay parallel to the old military road built and used by Braddock, which lay in plain sight, only a few rods away. Soon, as we wound up the side of the mountain, we came to Braddock's Spring, where his troops encamped while he and his officers were lodged in the barracks in the town. Here, near the spring, are the ruins of an old house, so overgrown with weeds and creepers that one might easily fancy them to be the ruins of a house put up to shelter the fastidious and aristocratic old general while on his visits to his soldiers.

Up and up we climb, and at last come to the mountain gap through which Braddock and his men finally marched, with proud heads, flaunting banners, and all the glory and pomp of a British army, to discomfiture and death. Here we will bid farewell to the brave but sorely mistaken hero and return to view Frederick in more modern guise.

MONUMENT TO FRANCIS SCOTT KEY.

As we draw near the city on our return we pass over the same old turnpike over which

"On that pleasant morn of the early fall
When Lee marched over the mountain-wall—"

Barbara Freitchie with the dear old, dishonored flag with its shattered staff in her hand

"* * * * leaned far out on the window-sill,
And shook it forth with a royal will"

and we can almost hear, above the rattle and roar of the electrics, the cry of the brave and patriotic old woman,

"Bowed with her fourscore years and ten,"
"Shoot, if you must, this old gray head,
But spare your country's flag * * * * *" and the grand words of the shamed but brave General, Stonewall Jackson, to his troops,

"Who touches one hair of yon gray head Dies like a dog. March on!" * * * * *

The little old house by the bridge where this drama of the Civil War was enacted, is gone now, and a brick business block has taken its place, but ever the spirit of Barbara Freitchie seems to haunt the place, and ever the stranger, passing by, sees the gray hair and flashing eye of the dauntless woman, and hears the brave tones of her tremulous voice. Barbara Freitchie has long been naught but a memory to her townspeople, for she lived but a few months after the episode which Whittier has immortalized, and today the traveler finds of her no trace but the graves of herself and her husband, side by side in the old walled cemetery of the Dutch Reformed Church in Frederick. Our initial shows a likeness of her.

Although this old Maryland city is not a place of great renown in the annals of the world, it has certainly done its share and given of its best in the upbuilding of the United States. Founded in 1645, it has seen our country grow from the smallest beginnings, and has contributed its full quota to its history and to its list of honorable men. All readers of the United States history will recall the two companies of riflemen raised here for the defence of the colonies in 1775 by Captain Michael Cresap; their long march to Cambridge, Massachusetts, where they were the first company from the South to arrive; and the wonderful exhibitions of expert marksmanship with which they entertained the people of Cambridge. We remember the intense indignation shown by the people of Frederick at the passing enforcement of the Stamp Act, and the mock funeral given by them to celebrate its demise, when it was finally crushed out of existence.

Here many a noted man, Henry Clay, Patrick Henry, William Henry Harrison, Andrew Jackson, Winfield Scott, Lafayette, passed back and forth from their homes to their posts in Washington, or delayed to visit and be entertained by the citizens. Here was the home of Roger B. Taney, Chief Justice of the United States, 1836-1864, and author of the famous Dred Scott Decision; and here now rest his remains in the old graveyard belonging to the Roman Catholic Church of Frederick.

Francis Scott Key, author of our grand National Hymn, the Star-Spangled Banner, began his life here in 1795, and after his death in 1843 his body was deposited in Mount Olivet Cemetery, adjoining the city, where a magnificent monument has recently been erected to his memory.

Another of the men whom American citizens delight to honor, Winfield Scott Schley, has his home in the country, not far from Frederick, and many of his ancestors belonged here.

During the Civil War Frederick was in the midst of the contention, and many a tale its residents can tell of war and strife, of defeat and victory. Few who were then living here will ever forget the various invasions into their borders of both Federals and Confederates, or the excitement and terror of that July, 1864, when the Federal Army, after long resistance, marched out by night and by stealth, leaving to the Confederates the barren victory of taking possession of a town from which all Unionists had departed, taking with them their money, horses, and valuables of every kind. In revenge the Confederate troops demanded from the city government the sum of $200,000, failing which they would burn the town as it stood. To save their homes the people of Frederick with difficulty raised the required sum, and so saved the town from destruction.

As the day drew to a close our train bore us away from Frederick, and our last glimpse of the old city showed it to us bathed in the beautiful sunset light, and we bade it farewell on the exact spot where "The clustered spires of Frederick stand,

Green-walled by the hills of Maryland."

THERE was at one time, and may still be, a horse in the United States army on the retired list, drawing a pension. This horse belonged to a near relative of General Custer, and was the only horse to escape the massacre in which the General was killed. His name is Comanche. He is cared for by a man who does nothing else, and his pension is sufficient to pay for his forage and for his transportation wherever he goes. He was found, after the battle, many miles away, with seven wounds and nearly exhausted from loss of blood. Upon his death he will be prepared and sent to the Smithsonian Institute at Washington.

Men, Women and Things.

CONDUCTED BY JENNIE MELVENE DAVIS.

Through the peculiar manner in which Congress has worked out its legislative methods, the Speaker of the House is the second man in the nation in political importance and influence. In some respects he possesses even more power than the President. For the first time in the history of the nation the honor is to be given to a man from west of the Mississippi river. The Hon. David B. Henderson of Iowa has been selected by the Republican leaders as the speaker of the next House. Mr. Henderson is familiar with the machinery by means of which the Speaker exercises his power. He has been a member of the Committee on Rules. It is through this committee that the Speaker exercises his authority. Mr. Henderson is also chairman of the Judiciary Committee. He has had a Congressional career of nearly twenty years, commencing his services as a member of the Forty-eighth Congress in 1882. At the outbreak of the Civil War, Col. Henderson enlisted in an Iowa regiment. The young private was but twenty-one years of age but he was at once made first lieutenant. He won promotion by bravery but in 1863 he lost a foot in battle. For about a year he served as a recruiting officer but resumed active duty again as the colonel of the Forty-sixth Iowa Infantry. When the war was over, he began the study of law and was admitted to the bar. He served for several years as collector of internal revenue. His active practice of law began in Dubuque, Iowa. Mr. Henderson is popular in his home where he receives many votes from his Democratic neighbors. No man in Congress has greater personal popularity. Notwithstanding his aggressive support of Republican principles he is popular with the opposition. He has the confidence of his associates and is known as a man of strict honesty and strong convictions. He is an eloquent speaker and a skilled debater. While he is firm and vigorous in the enforcement of his ideas it is not supposed that he will adopt all the methods that earned Mr. Reed the title of Czar.

Popular opinion may be divided in regard to prosecutors of the war in the Philippines but there is but one opinion concerning the man who has won fame on the battlefield. General Funston has shown a dashing bravery that has won him promotion and the enthusiastic admiration that is always given to pluck and grit. Like so many other well-known men he claims Ohio as his birthplace. He is of Scotch-Irish descent and comes of a race of hard workers and fighters. General Funston inherits his small stature from his mother as his father is a giant physically. Funston was brought up in Kansas and passed from the ordinary district school to the High School and then to the State University at Lawrence, Kansas. He was noted for studiousness and for a remarkable memory which retained a heterogeneous mass of facts with great accuracy and detail. His father thinks today that his son's career should have been in scholastic fields instead of on the battlefield. Young Funston was train cashier on the Santa Fe for a time but became interested in the collecting expeditions sent to the west from the State University. He had a short experience as a newspaper reporter and was then sent into New Mexico by the Department of Agriculture. His life here was wild enough to satisfy even his love of adventure. His horse slipped from under him and was dashed over a cliff 1,000 feet in height while the future general clung to some shrubs and crawled back into safety. He made an expedition to Alaska in the interest of the government. He has spent some time as a lecturer on the topics of interest that have come under his observation. There was however a wild vein in the Celtic blood that would not down, and Funston enlisted in the Cuban army. He fought in twenty-two battles, was wounded in the lungs and through the arm and attained the rank of lieutenant-colonel and the command of all the artillery east of Havana. When the United States declared war against Spain, Funston obtained the command of the Twentieth Regiment of Kansas. He went to Tampa where he gave General Miles much valuable information concerning the Cuban climate and the condition of affairs. He was ordered to the Philippines and on his way was married to Miss Eda Blankart in San Francisco. His personal bravery and daring have made him a popular idol since then. He writes in an unusual manner the student, the soldier and the wild love of change and adventure that makes border lives. He is a quiet, modest man, not at all fanciful or imaginative. He is thoroughly informed upon a variety of topics among them being the tariff, Alaskan mining, the Arctic fisheries, the tea and coffee trade of the world; geographical measurements, and the army. Those are subjects that have come under his attention from his varied occupations. He possesses the faculty of possessing himself at once of all obtainable information in regard to the particular thing that he is then occupied with. As he never forgets a fact his fund of information is as vast as it is varied. He has the faculty of intense absorption in the matter of the moment and his success may lie in this ability to concentrate and to throw all his energy in the subject.

Cynthia Westover Alden is one of the best known newspaper women in the United States. She has made the Woman's Page of the New York Tribune one of the strongest features of the paper. She has put the dignity, versatility and life into the pages of her journal. Mrs. Alden is one of the officers of the International League of Press Clubs and represented the Press Women of the United States at the International Council of Women held in London during the past summer. Mrs. Alden is a tall, commanding looking woman with a face that shows the strong character and the womanliness that have enabled her to win her enviable place in the ranks of plucky women who have succeeded. She has outlined the story of her life in "Bushy" one of her latest books. Her childhood and early girlhood were spent in the mining camps and lonely mountain trails of the West. Her father is a mineralogist and mining expert and after the death of her mother, the little girl of four was his constant companion. She learned to shoot anything from buffaloes to Indians, to ride and to speak Spanish and various Indian dialects. She was finally placed in a public school and from the public schools of Denver she passed into the State University where she took a degree and the honors in mathematics. She taught and paid for her own education. During the vacations she went to the annual roundish where her old friends the cowboys welcomed the college girl as their old friend Bushy. They called her "Our Girl" and branded stray cattle with O. G. The sale of these cattle paid for her last year in college. After teaching a year she determined to come to New York and to make her living as a singer. Instruction and living in New York are both expensive but Cynthia Westover solved the problem on one side by a hall bedroom and fifteen cents a day for meals. The meals were a plate of soup for dinner and a loaf of bread for breakfast and lunch. A tuning fork took the place of a piano and with these helps she fought her way to a position as soprano in a city church. She next received a position as inspectress in the Custom House through a competitive examination. During this time she learned French, German and Italian. She resigned this position to become private secretary to the commissioner of street cleaning. Her knowledge of Italian was very useful to the department in their dealings with the street laborers. Mrs. Alden invented a dump cart which is in general use. She has a medal for this achievement from the Parisian Society of Inventors. Mrs. Alden was successively superintendent of a candy factory and a cataloguer in the Missions of Natural History. Her knowledge of mineralogy and geology has stood her in good stead more than once, private lessons in those sources eking out her income when she was studying music. She commenced doing newspaper work during this period and in 1895 became editor of the Woman's Page of the New York Recorder, going from that paper to the Tribune. She married Mr. Alden who was one of the editors of the Recorder. She has shown the genius, capacity and versatility of the best type of American womanhood. Her sincerity, her honesty and her determination have been potent factors in her success. Mrs. Alden always has a kind word and a helping hand for others who are making the struggle that she has turned into success. Her simplicity of manner, her wide experience and her tactfulness mark the polished woman of the world, but the warm-hearted cordiality is that of the child of frontier days.

The recent death of Rosa Bonheur has awakened interest in the best known of her famous paintings—the Horse Fair. The original canvas is in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York City. It was first owned in this country by A. T. Stewart the merchant prince and was purchased at the sale of his pictures in 1887 by Cornelius Vanderbilt for $55,000 and presented to the Art Museum. It is the second large canvas painted by Rosa Bonheur and is said to be the largest canvas ever produced by an animal painter. Miss Bonheur began her study for the picture by painting the portraits of horses owned by friends and finally began to visit the stock yards of Paris. The attention she attracted led her to adopt male attire—a fashion she ever after followed. The picture was exhibited at the Paris Salon of 1853 and was awarded all the honors. Bonheur sent the picture in 1855 to her native town of Bordeau and offered to sell it to the town for $2,400. A dealer wished to purchase it to take to England for the purpose of having it engraved. Miss Bonheur said the price would be $8,000 if it left France. The town did not purchase the picture and the dealer procured it for the price named. Miss Bonheur said he had paid a noble price and as she did not believe so large a picture would engrave well she offered to make a quarter size replica as a gift. This was done and the small picture is now in the National Gallery in London. A second still smaller replica was sold in London some time ago for $20,000. A water color drawing of the same picture was sold for $12,000. The Horse Fair is one of the best-known pictures in the world as it has been engraved and reproduced by all the modern processes but its popularity does not seem to lessen. Rosa Bonheur was but thirty years of age when she painted this smaller piece.

The Czarowitz George of Russia whose tragic death occurred during the summer lived under the cloud that seems to follow the title of Czarowitz. The word means "son of the Czar" yet it has often been borne by the brother of the ruling monarch. It is a title rather than a sign of heirship to the throne and has often been borne by other than the named successor to the throne. It is a rule of the royal house of Russia that the Czar must name his successor the day of his coronation. In the event of that successor's death the next heir must be named within twenty-four hours. In accordance with this custom the Czar named his younger brother Michael as his successor before the world had heard the news of the death of Czarowitz George. Grand Duke Michael may be congratulated that the title Czarowitz has not been conferred, as a tragic fate has overshadowed all who bore the Muscovite title. The heir presumptive is a little over twenty-one years of age. His personal characteristics are but little known but he is said to be under the influence of his mother the dowager Empress and in sympathy with her policy which is one of reaction and anti-liberal in the extreme. In case the Emperor is unable to fill the duties of his rank or dies leaving a minor son, Duke Michael is entitled to the regency. The rumors that the Czar is mentally unbalanced and that he means to abdicate marks the character of this hitherto unknown boy of great importance. It is said that the officials of the Russian Government are in sympathy with the reactionary policy of the Grand Duke and entirely opposed to all the liberal ideas of Czar Nicholas. For this reason the Czar meets with strenuous opposition whenever he tries to change the old spirit of Russian Government. Grand Duke Michael will be heir presumptive until the Empress gives birth to a son. Her third daughter has awakened interest in the old Isigane prophecy that the Empress would give birth to seven daughters before a son was born. It is the general feeling that Grand Duke Michael has a strong chance to become the next ruler of Russia.

"There's a little red faced man
Which is Bobs,
Rides the tallest 'orse he can

are the lines written about the best-known soldier in England, Lord Roberts of Kandahas. "Bobs" is the idol of the rank and file of the army of England. Lord Roberts is the son of a soldier and his son in turn is keeping up the fighting traditions of the family under Kitchener. Lord Roberts' son saw his first hard service in the Indian mutiny of 1857. He has been wounded again and again but Tommy Atkins believes that Bobs can not be killed. Lord Roberts wears the Victoria cross among many other decorations given for signal bravery in the field. At the Queen's Jubilee it seemed as though the throngs were shouting for "Bobs" alone so continuous was the roar of applause that followed him. It would take a book to tell the exciting scenes that have followed fifty years' campaigning in India. "Bobs'" horse Vonolel is the only horse in the world that wears a decoration bestowed for distinguished military service. By command of the Queen, Vonolel wears the medal of Kandahar in his breast strap. Lord Roberts is an ardent temperance man and one out of every eight of her majesty's soldiers has joined the Army Temperance Association which Lord Roberts reorganized about ten years ago.

TOBACCO CURE.

How a Mother Banished Cigarettes and Tobacco—A Harmless Remedy That Can Be Given in Tea, Coffee or Food.

Anyone Can Have a Free Trial Package by Sending Name and Address.

Some time ago a well known business man whose stomach and nerves were ruined by the tobacco habit was secretly given a remedy by his wife and he never knew what cured him of the habit. He suddenly evinced such a dislike for tobacco that he concluded the weed had finally floored him and that his own determination made him quit; she then treated her son, a young man just 21. He was a cigarette fiend, inhaling the deadly fumes almost constantly and he too was made sick of the "weed." His mother enjoys a quiet laugh to herself, at the manner in which the young man tells of how he came to the conclusion that cigarettes were "drugged and poisoned now-a-days and not fit to smoke."

The remedy is odorless and tasteless, can be mixed with coffee or food and when taken into the system a man cannot use tobacco in any form. The remedy contains nothing that could possibly do injury. It is simply an antidote for the poisons of tobacco and takes nicotine out of the system. It will cure even the confirmed cigarette fiend and is a God-send to mothers who have growing boys addicted to the smoking of cigarettes. The remedy is called Tobacco Specific and a free trial package of the remedy will be mailed prepaid upon application to Rogers Drug and Chemical Co., 236 Fifth and Race Sts., Cincinnati, Ohio. This will help any woman to solve the problem of curing her husband, son or brother of a habit that undermines the health leaving the body susceptible to numerous lingering and dangerous diseases.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

EVERY reader of COMFORT will remember the fear we all had a year ago or more when the Spanish fleet was hovering near our coast because it was accompanied by torpedo boats. There was great public fear that we were so weak in one naval arm, the torpedo boat, that we should have no chance in a fight. We also remember how night after night the searchlights on the great ships both at Havana and Santiago swept the seas in constant watchfulness for these night hawks of the sea.

Happily our fears were not realized but there can be no possible doubt that the lesson then taught was learned completely and now in the building up of that navy of which we are all so proud are being placed in it some of the fastest boats ever produced. These boats are mechanical workers and small as they are attain the great speed of thirty knots, or nearly thirty-five miles, an hour. Torpedo boats pure and simple originally were swift little steamers armed with torpedoes and intended to attack great warships in the darkness and then retreat, relying on superior speed to escape.

When the torpedo boat had attained the reputation, European nations commenced building destroyers, that is, torpedo boats on larger scale and also armed with a battery of rapid fire guns capable of blowing a torpedo boat to pieces before she could reach the point of attack. Although the American navy retain the name torpedo boats, they in reality are the same class as the European destroyer. Four of this dangerous class of fighters are practically ready to be added to the navy. They are named after American naval heroes, Dahlgren, Bailey, Craven and Stringham, all of them being exceptionally fine and swift boats. Our picture shows the Stringham on a two-hour dash of 60-miles, the government test. These boats are about 200 feet long and sharp as knives. The cost completed is in the neighborhood of $200,000 each.

The assassination of President Heureux of Santo Domingo by some political opponents has thrown the whole island into insurrection. A picture of the murdered President in full uniform shows him to have been a handsome colored man of pleasant looks. The warfare which has been going on reads like some of the burlesques of warfare in comic operas; but there is a very serious side to the question which involves our own country. The island is next to Porto Rico and many of its inhabitants now wish to be annexed. Property holders are tired of the burlesque government, while others are ambitious for a new government.

Meanwhile the government has sent two warships to protect American interests and to prevent filibustering from Porto Rico and Cuba. On the latter island is General Jimenez, who has been organizing the rebellion from Cuban soil. It is believed that his followers are responsible for the assassination. Close watch was kept upon him and he was arrested by military authorities just as he was about to take a steamer at Cienfuegos. The Cubans, who generally side with him, were indignant and many threats were made. To avoid trouble he finally was released from arrest. General Juan Isidro Jimenez is a fine specimen of manhood and a noted leader. As soon as he took personal charge of the revolution the people looked upon him to prove as great a leader as Garcia proved for the Cuban insurgents. Consequently he has been proclaimed president and the country has accepted him with acclamation.

JUAN ISIDRO JIMENEZ.

The resignation of Secretary Alger from his position in the War Department caused the press writers to turn their guns upon a new party to criticise. It is now General Otis' turn to suffer and there seems to be a very general desire to replace him in command with a general of more decision and force. It is undoubtedly true that his conduct of the war in the Philippines has aroused the severest criticism among his officers and men who are amazed and indignant at his indecisive tactics. This lack of definite purpose and fighting qualities is hurting us in the islands and giving the Filipinos encouragement. Much talk has been made that the administration intends to replace Otis with General Merritt, who may be depended upon to fight with purpose and distinction, and while not actually discrediting him to make him the civil head of the provisional government and leave Gen. Merritt to plan the war.

Notwithstanding the press, President McKinley evidently believes that he has more information than the ordinary reader and it seems evident that Gen. Otis with an army of 50,000 men with plenty of supplies will be a very different man than with a small army that cannot be weakened by leaving garrison in every captured town.

Secretary Root has taken a firm hold at the war department and is acting with great grasp and decision. The additional army is being rapidly raised and already part of it is on its way to the Philippines. After the rainy season the cool, dry days of November come and with it we may look for an early crushing out of the insurrection. After that it will be seen that our intentions for a free local government are carried out. Many of the political criticisms on the administration are made for party advantage. As a matter of fact it is evident so far as present intentions are concerned, all Americans stand on practically the same ground.

Had Great Britain not been so friendly to America during the Spanish war it is probable that the present would have been a time of trouble and dissension. Ever since the large finds of gold in the Klondike region the transportation has been from Seattle, Vancouver and other ports to the Alaskan coast. A glance at the map will show that the coast is much indented often having deep arms of the sea pushing far inland. On these bays the principal seaports are built. Under the understanding that has always existed, the terms of the sale and treaties have given the United States the interpretation that the phrase "a point ten miles from the coast and following the same" meant a line following ten miles including the indentations. So long as the country was uninhabited it made little or no difference; but now all is changed and Canada finds herself cut off from all accessible seaports to connect with the Yukon district. As a consequence all goods have to be shipped to American ports.

The claim was at once made that the line was intended to be a straight line cutting off many bays and "canals" and placing them, at least in part, in Canadian territory. The issue at one time threatened to become serious even to a rupture of peaceful relations; but notwithstanding the warlike threats of the Canadian leaders, statesmen in the two countries have settled upon a satisfactory mode for temporary purposes, by which the absolute settlement will be made later and the boundary definitely agreed on. In the meantime Canada acquires temporary rights in a port of entry on the Lynn canal. These pleasant results are largely the work of Senator Fairbanks, American chairman of the commission engaged on disputed questions of American and Canadian interests.

Senator Fairbanks is at present one of the most prominent men in our foreign relations. He is a comparatively young man, having been born in 1852 in a log cabin in Union County, Ohio, with a sugar trough for a cradle. Senator Fairbanks is a typical, successful, self-made, American. Born in the rough poverty above indicated, he as a boy cleared up 200 acres of land while attending the district school. Ambitious to learn, he entered college with one suit of clothes and forty-one dollars in his pocket. It is said a local clothes dealer refused him credit on a three dollar pair of trousers. In company with an equally poor fellow-student he shared living expenses and ate for food bread, potatoes and corn mush, all this time adding to his income by working as a carpenter on Saturdays at a dollar and a quarter a day. In this hard school he fought out his battle until he entered the bar as a lawyer, since when he has gradually advanced until his election as U. S. Senator two years ago.

SENATOR C. W. FAIRBANKS.

It is sometimes said "it is an ill wind that blows no good," and certainly this could be said of the terribly destructive hurricane that swept the West India islands early in August. Not only in the hurricane itself did our soldiers heroically stand by the natives and save thousands of lives; but our whole nation quickly responded to Secretary Root's call for aid to the distressed. It is said that from 2000 to 3000 Porto Ricans were killed and that 100,000 lost everything. Accustomed as this new people were to Spanish apathy to their distress, it was a revelation to see what humanity could be displayed by an American government. It will undoubtedly win goodwill and loyalty among this people, who have hardly become acquainted with us yet. Severe as this storm was, Cuba nearly escaped loss, though all the islands of the Antilles suffered to a greater or less extent. Our government is already laying the first stones for the foundation of Cuban self-government. All the preparations for a new census, the figures of which will be available on January 1st, have been made. This will replace the Spanish census of 1886, which was inaccurate. Under our census it is intended to obtain the usual statistics which accompany the count of the people in this country; so that our government may have reliable data at hand when considering the welfare and needs of the Cubans in their proposed local government. The good faith of the United States is being shown by the rapid appointment of native Cubans to offices of local trust so far as is possible. The general condition of the island seems everywhere to show improvement and advancement. As soon as there is a settled and stable government, millions of dollars will be put into industrial schemes which now remain but partly developed on account of the uncertainty of the future. This distrust will disappear and confidence come as soon as the capitalists can be assured that no such government as appears in the so-called Spanish republics is to take the place of the Spanish rule in Cuba. When a strong, stable government shows a permanency of institutions we may look to see Cuba become one of the wealthiest lands, area considered, in the whole world.

GEN. E. S. OTIS.

IN CONSUMPTION'S GRASP.

MRS. JULIA A. DYE TELLS OF HER SON'S MARVELOUS CURE WITH DR. SLOCUM'S TREATMENT.

From Hemorrhage and Rapid Decline the Famous Physician Led Him to Health and Strength. Now Weighs 170 Pounds.

Thousands of Full Course Free Treatments being Sent to All Sufferers from Lung Weakness and all Pulmonary and Wasting Diseases.

The grand free distribution of thousands of Dr. Slocum's Famous Treatment for consumption, lung weakness and kindred pulmonary diseases is working a revolution throughout the country.

The cures being daily recorded show that the eminent physician has at last discovered an absolute specific for the deadly bacilli, or rather a series of specifics, there being four separate preparations in the full course, which is sent out free of cost to all who apply.

Lung weakness and consumption are so dangerous and rapid that Dr. Slocum realizes the necessity of making as many cures as possible without charge, for the benefit of the examples to others who have long since despaired of relief, let alone a cure.

The case of M. H. Dye, of Gibson, Ky., is one which has astounded everybody in that part of the state; but it is a mere repetition of the grand work being performed all over the country by the most celebrated lung specialist in the world.

Read the testimony.

Mrs. Julia A. Dye, writing for her son, M. H. Dye, of Gibson, Ky., says:—

"My son contracted consumption, which began with a coid in his chest about a year ago. He grew worse rapidly; and finally had hemorrhages, which made him weaker every day. We did not think he could recover, for all treatments we tried had little or no effect. After months of despair I finally read in Pentecostal Herald about Dr. Slocum's far-famed discoveries for curing the most hopeless cases of consumption, and knowing this paper would not publish untruthful news, I sent for one of the Free Treatments, and with little real faith my son began taking it. The effect was wonderful! He began to mend at once; the hemorrhages stopped; then the cough ceased; he began to gain in strength and weight, and is now entirely cured, and weighs 170 pounds. I gladly send you this testimony, and my earnest prayer is that others may know what Dr. Slocum has done for my son. May the blessings of God ever be with you for discovering and introducing this wonderful treatment. Please send this testimony to the Elizabethtown Leader; also the Herald. I shall do all I can to spread the good news of the miracle you have worked."

No matter how utterly hopeless your case may seem, Dr. Slocum's discoveries, which usher in a new era in medical treatment, will cure you as it has thousands of others. As the candle gave way to oil, and oil to gas and electricity, so also is the old consumptive treatment giving way to Slocum, who is receiving the praises of the greatest medical men of the world.

If you have any form of lung trouble, asthma, pulmonary or wasting away discases, write to-day for the full course of Free Treatment and it will be sent promptly. Not a little sample, but four generous size preparations, which will work wonders.

Address Dr. T. A. Slocum, 98 Pine St., New York City, N. Y., stating you read this article in COMFORT.

When in doubt and in need of expert advice, Dr. Slocum will give it together with accurate diagnosis free of all cost.

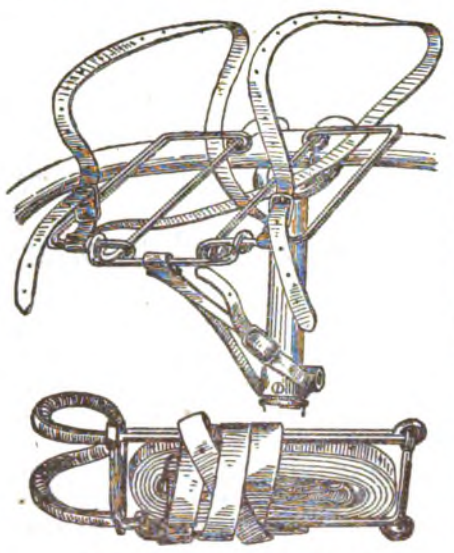
CONDUCTED BY EVERETT G. WHEELMAN.

"ACCIDENTS will happen even among the best riders" we might transpose the old adage to read, and so I am going to give some simple rules which were compiled by a physician, himself a wheelman, and which it will be well for you all to cut out and save, even if you do not literally "paste them in your hat."

Injuries received in riding are almost always bruised wounds, and hemorrhages would very seldom be a very serious complication. Firm pressure with the fingers or with a suitably adjusted dressing at the place where the bleeding is will meet the majority of cases. Should the bleeding be very severe from a limb and not controlled by these means, one should apply a tourniquet by circling the limb with a bandage and then twisting this with a stick thrust beneath it until the blood can no longer flow into the limb from the body.

Fractures of all bones in the body have one time or another resulted from bicycle accidents and it is important that they should be properly cared for. The seriousness of the injury depends first upon the question whether in addition to the breaking of the bone the flesh has been so injured that air can enter. A simple fracture in proportion to the severity of the injury heals more kindly than almost any other. All that is necessary is that the broken fragments of bone should be placed and held in their proper position and in a definite length of time, which differs in different bones they will become firmly united by a new growth of osseous tissue.



When a fracture has taken place it will be evident by the pain and the fact that the limb will bend at a place where it naturally is stiff, and by a deformity caused by the misplaced bone. A fractured limb should be brought to as nearly as possible the same shape as its fellow of the opposite side. Then it should be supported by splints, which can be made from almost any kind of a stick. These should be thoroughly padded by a wrapping of some soft material, and then bound along the sides of the limb. The splints should always be long enough to extend over and beyond the joint above and the one below the seat of fracture.

A bruise or contusion consists of an injury to the tissue in which the small blood vessels have been broken, allowing the escape of blood into the flesh and under the skin. The very best treatment for a bruise is the application of water as hot as can be borne without actual scalding, though this is a trifle hotter than the patient thinks necessary. Curiously enough, the next best treatment, when hot water is not obtainable, is very cold water. If there is great pain the clothing may be saturated with laudanum or alcohol.

A lacerated wound, that is one with ragged edges, must usually heal not by immediate union of its edges, such as is called first intention, but by a more tedious process of throwing off the bruised organisms and the growth of new flesh and skin.

The essential thing in the care of such a wound is cleanliness and subsequent protection from infection. The wound should be thoroughly cleansed with water, preferably water that has been boiled. Then the wound should be protected by a suitable dressing. The ideal dressing prevents the entrance of air and dust, while at the same time it allows the escape of any fluid that may form in the wound. It may also be saturated with something that has the property of destroying germs, but it must not thereby be rendered irritant to the wound. This is so difficult to accomplish that better average results are obtained by dressings which though not antiseptic, are still thoroughly clean and very absorbent. While any cotton or linen fabric may be used, perhaps the most desirable is the soft cheesecloth. This material may be quickly rendered surgically clean by boiling for fifteen minutes or by placing in a hot oven and heating it just short of the burning point. The dressing should be applied, as a rule, dry. It is best to fold closely a good quantity of the material to cover the wound with it and then bind this in place with a bandage of some kind. Bandages can always be successfully improvised from handkerchiefs.

When a person is thrown from a wheel and lands on the head he is very likely to be unconscious for a time. This may be due to a simple jarring of the brain, which for the time being prevents it from acting, or it may be due to a fracture of the skull, or a rupture of a blood-vessel which has given rise to a blood clot pressing on the brain.

FOLDING LUGGAGE CARRIER.

If the fall is so severe that internal organs have been injured, the case resolves itself usually into the management of the condition of shock. Remember the cardinal principle of absolute rest in a recumbent position, warmth and stimulation. If the patient is spitting up blood or vomiting blood, there is nothing better that the amateur surgeon can do than to keep him absolutely quiet and trust to nature to bring the hemorrhage to an end. Hemorrhages usually terminate of themselves and there is really greater danger of prolonging them by meddlesome treatment such as putting anything into the stomach, than there is probability of accomplishing any good. There are many cases where the care of the patient outbalances the care of his injury in importance. When a person has received a severe injury very often he is in a state of complete collapse, the appearance of which you will never forget after you have once seen it. The treatment of shock resolves itself into the treatment of symptoms; the heart's feeble action calls for stimulants, the extremely cold surface calls for the application of external heat, the low condition of the person's strength calls for its conservation by leaving him as nearly as possible without interference.

HOW TO MOUNT A WHEEL. RIGHT SIDE.

The following extract from the book, First Aid to the Injured is of interest here:

Provide yourself with a light wooden or tin box, preferably with a cover sliding lengthwise, the inside measurements of the box being length 18 in., breadth 6 in., height 4 in.

The following supplies should be neatly packed in it:

Two splints—i. e., thin pieces of board, 17 1-2 inches long, 3 1-2 inches wide, 1-4 of an inch thick (boxwood).

Two shorter splints, 12 inches long and 3 inches wide.

An Esmarch tourniquet—i. e., a strip of rubber 48 inches long, 3-4 of an inch wide and 3-16 of an inch thick.

Four ounces absorbent cotton.

Four unbleached muslin roller bandages, 3 inches by 6 yards.

Four triangular bandages, lower border to measure 4 feet, side borders 2 feet 10 inches.

Two sponges, two to three inches in diameter.

One paper of pins, large ones.

Six needles, threaded with coarse white cotton thread.

One yard rubber adhesive plaster (in tin box).

Two ounces of laudanum, with label indicating use.

Two ounces whiskey, with label indicating use, especially in shock.

Now, here are the rules which it will be well for you to preserve, but here's hoping you will never need them.

A dealer gives this receipt for the care of tires: "Heat causes expansion, and there is just the possibility, well to be avoided, of a sudden burst. So, though it is excellent to have the tire tight, a watchful eye must be cast every now and then on the extent of its firmness. Further it is an excellent plan, and will do much to preserve the nature of the rubber, if every now and then the tires are rubbed with a damp cloth. Occasional moisture is beneficial to the rubber. Don't, however, ride the wheel through little streams that often cut across roads in country parts. The damp is likely to get in between the tube and the rim. There are times, of course, during a tour when riding through slush and water cannot well be avoided. In that case I would advise that at night the tire be deflated and the air allowed free access."

This is worth trying, anyway.

Cured of Drinking.

A Woman's Secret Method whereby she Cured her Husband who was a terrible Drunkard by Mixing a Remedy in his Coffee and Food curing him without his Help or Knowledge.

It takes a woman to overcome obstacles. Mrs. Chas. W. Harry, 920 York St., Newport, Ky., had for years patiently borne the disgrace, suffering, misery and privation due to her husband's drinking habits. Learning there was a cure for drunkenness which she could give her husband secretly she decided to try it. She mixed it in his food and coffee and as the remedy is odorless and tasteless he never knew what it was that so quickly relieved the craving for liquor. He soon began to pick up in flesh, his appetite for solid food returned, he stuck to his work regularly and they now have a happy home. Mr. Harry was told about his wife's experiment and he gives her the credit of having restored him to his senses. It is certainly a remarkable remedy, cures a man without his effort, does him no harm and causes him no suffering whatever.

"Along the river's summer walk,
The withered tufts of asters nod;
And trembles on its arid stalk,
The hoar plume of the goldenrod.
And on a ground of sombre fir,
And azure-studded juniper,
The silver birch its buds of purple shows,
And scarlet berries tell where bloomed the sweet wild rose.

And I will trust that he who heeds
The life that hides in mead and wold,
Who hangs yon alder's crimson beads,
And stains these mosses green and gold,
Will still, as he hath done, incline
His gracious care to me and mine;
Grant what we ask aright, from wrong debar,
And, as the earth grows dark, make brighter every star."

DEAR NIECES AND NEPHEWS:

Text and sermon all in one, and the dear old Quaker, Whittier, for the preacher. It is too beautiful for me to mar with a word of mine, and we will go on to the letters.

Our first letter is written by one who has herself recently completed a course in librarianship, so she surely knows of what she speaks, and perhaps her words will help some other young girl with whom the question "What shall I choose for an occupation?" is still a burning one. She says:

CONTRARY to the times of our grandparents, young girls now expect to earn their own bread and butter, and it is not an uncommon thing for them to ask, 'What shall I do to earn my living?' Perhaps no occupation offers so much attraction as librarianship and yet no other profession is so little understood.

"In the first place what does it mean to be a librarian? Formerly, when libraries for the public were few and small, any one who could distribute books to the public and keep account of them was supposed to be qualified for librarian ship; but in the present day, when humanity is ascending higher and higher on the ladder of progress, and public libraries are increasing in size and wealth, the field of the librarian has become vastly widened until it has grown to be a science.

"As the importance of the extent and scope of the knowledge of the librarian is becoming more and more recognized so the demands for a skillful and efficient custodian of books increase in direct proportion. That librarian is most valuable who can best serve the public, and to serve the public well requires more than an ordinary knowledge of books. By a knowledge of books I do not mean that one must read every book of any note, but he must be familiar with the great range of books in general on any subject whatsoever, so as to be able to direct or advise students in their different lines of research. This knowledge is not possessed by the average individual and consequently must be acquired through careful study of the national literatures and perusal of book reviews and criticisms. This knowledge of books, called bibliography, includes, besides acquaintance with the leading works on all subjects, their authors and titles, knowledge of editions, printing and binding, as well as classification and cataloging of books. A librarian should have his information ready at his fingers' ends and be able to meet any demand in any department of learning. So his training should be the broadest and yet the most impartial.

"Another qualification is now demanded; a knowledge of at least two modern languages—French and German. The librarian who knows neither or only one of these can never be familiar with the contents of his own library. He is constantly at a loss when questioned about the foreign books in his charge, and is often embarrassed through ignorance of them. He can not read his foreign periodicals and reviews so necessary to his efficiency and capability.

"The demand for highly educated and trained librarians is daily increasing and consequently many training schools for this purpose have been established. Statistics show that the number of women in the library business is steadily growing and will soon exceed the number of men. It is a profession peculiarly fitted for the former, as it requires a taste and refinement which are naturally possessed by women. As the best is required so the best will be forthcoming and though it may seem to many that there is no room for them in library work, 'there is always room at the top.'"

GERTRUDE E. UPTON, Washington, D. C.

Now here is an exceedingly well-written article by Louretta C. Cole, on the Hawaiian Islands, but as it is only a compiled article I cannot use it. Salona Merritt, of Helena, Montana, is another cousin whose interesting article on Mrs. Dolly Madison must be refused for the same reason. I am very sorry.

Next let us visit the quaint old church of San Miguel in Santa Fe, under the guidance of our cousin, Margaret Spencer.

"During our interesting and historic journey through New Mexico, nothing was more impressive and quaint than the old San Miguel church, which stands, a relic of centuries, in the heart of Santa Fe. San Miguel was built in the sixteenth century, and entirely destroyed during the great Pueblo revolution of 1680. In 1710 the Marquis de Penola caused it to be rebuilt on the same ground, preserving the stones, and shape as much as possible, from his own ideas of an ancient church.

As early as 1538 De Baca passed through the Rio Grande valley, and found Santa Fe quite a prosperous Pueblo village; but in 1680, when San Miguel was destroyed by the revolution, the early records of the country were lost, and the entire history of its European settlement swept away by the destruction of the archives and their treasures.

"Of this old church we had heard wondrous stories, read descriptions of its plaster walls, its odd style and sacred traditions, so from our hotel, one summer morning, we took a carriage and drove there to six o'clock mass. We passed into the church by the low door behind the stone wall, to find service already begun and the worshipers all kneeling on the cold stone floor. Outside the sunshine of a cloudless day flooded the gray stones, gilded the slender cross and gave to the very walls a glory of morning, and life and praise; inside it was dark, cold, and dreary. Crumbling plaster, cracks and marks of ages, as it looked to be to us, told stories of long years, of lives and deaths and strange histories.

"The women were wrapped, like all Mexican women, in vibosas or mantas, their hands and arms hidden in the black folds. The dark faced men bowed to the cold stone floor, now and then glancing at the altar in devotional manner. They chanted, or sang in a low monotonous voice, some dreary, wailing hymn, while the responses were slow, deep toned and weird. The worshipers were typical Spanish-Mexicans, and the altar with its gayly embroidered altar cloth, its tall candles, vases and artificial flowers, very like Catholic churches of more modern date. The young priest, with his small acolytes, added to the picturesque air of the place; ancient pictures on the walls, a few costly golden candlesticks on the altar, made up a quaint, dark, hidden away place of worship in this far-off valley among the hills, and we had attended service in this oldest church of New Mexico.

"The young priest met us outside the door and was charmingly cordial; introducing us as 'friends' to the priests of St. Michael's College, who had been to morning service. This college stands close to the church and is most prosperous and well sustained. The teachers call themselves 'Christian Brethren,' whose schools have long been established all over the world. One handsome young brother urged us to come in and take breakfast with them and see their boys. Catholics send their boys to this college from all parts of New Mexico and Colorado, thinking it a great privilege for them to be taught in the shadow of old San Miguel church. Very intelligent people go long distances with their sick and dying, for service and confession, thinking the spirits of saints of many centuries dwell within San Miguel's sacred walls.

"We took the photograph as a souvenir, and not only the historic, interesting church was preserved, but the very air of the summer morning, the wonderful sunshine, the far-away mountains and the strange people, will forever remain a picture painted on our minds and hearts."

MARGARET SPENCER, East River, Conn.

Rob Reynolds, of Asheville, N. C., writes me an account of a two days' trip in the mountains which shows that he, at least, enjoyed his summer's outing.

Another letter which I must return thanks for but cannot use, is by Miss Deborah S. Bass, of Littleton, N. H. This article is very pleasantly written, and ought to succeed in getting published elsewhere.

Our next letter is upon a subject very interesting to all western farmers, and perhaps easterners will be even more pleased to read of the methods of their western brothers.

"The Kansas farmer looks forward to the maturing of a good corn crop as perhaps the Egyptian does to the overflowing of the Nile, for it is upon this resource that he depends largely for a livelihood. If the weather is favorable he plants his corn as early as the month of March, for early corn matures the best and corn planted in March matures in July. If the farmer has not had much fall plowing done, and is in a hurry to get his corn planted in the spring he lists his ground, which is a much quicker way of preparing it than plowing. A lister takes a row at a time and has two boards which throw the earth both ways, leaving a deep furrow. After listing a cultivator is run through the furrows and then they are ready for the planter. After planting the ground is rolled until it is very level and then the corn is ready for cultivation.

"In June the sun and earth seem to harmonize, and all vegetation grows with startling rapidity. During this period the farmer has no time to swap knives. Everything that looks like a cultivator is put to good use, for corn grows on the jump; it will grow six inches in a single night. About the middle of June it has attained a height and density which shades the ground; the broad green leaves are interlaced and droop almost to the earth. Now care must be taken that the cows do not get into the corn, for if they did hunting them would be like looking for a needle in a haystack.

"In October comes corn-husking time, and from now until after Christmas farmers are in the field early and late. They husk with only one man to a wagon, and use what is called a bump-board on one side to prevent the corn from going over. When a man is husking rapidly at the rate of a dollar a day, with perhaps three ears in the air at a time it is very necessary to have this board. Many times if there is a big production of corn there is a scarcity of crib room; then the corn is piled in great heaps upon the ground. At such times corn is perhaps cheaper than coal, and as a bushel of corn would burn almost as long as a bushel of coal immense quantities are used by the farmers to keep back the frost line."

GEORGE JOHNSON, Burlington, Kansas.

Now we have a description of a storm on the prairie.

"The storm was approaching fast and we hurriedly started for home, the clouds rolling up black and threatening in the northwest, with the wind due east. We felt confident the storm would not strike us while the wind was in that direction, but the clouds were moving fast toward the south. Just one mile of our journey had been passed when a drop of rain struck us. While we sped over the level road I watched the clouds as they piled up higher and higher; then an opposing current of air would separate them a moment, and they would gather together again blacker than ever. The wind was acting queer. The long grass rose and fell like ocean waves, and near us a clump of willows were twining around each other; each leaf and twig seemed to be giving and taking a last embrace. The wind had changed; it was now a race with the storm. The clouds had changed from black to green and all around the edges they were frothed with yellowish white. The green mass was churning and boiling over its entire surface, and now and then casting off its yellowish froth. Gradually they closed in on us, but we had reached home, and from its safe shelter we watched the storm. A house only a quarter of a mile away became invisible; willows and cottonwoods bowed low, even to the ground, and the darkness of late twilight came upon us. No living creature could face the torrents of water that now burst upon us. Sheets upon sheets came down, laying the long, waving grass even with the ground. Limbs were torn from the willows, cottonwoods snapped off midway, seemingly by the weight of the down-pouring waters, for the wind seemed to be silenced by the mighty flood. It all passed in less than half an hour, and again the sun shone and the birds sang; but the dooryard was a lake of water. NEBRASKA.

I wonder how many of my readers have ever heard of or seen the curious lake described in the next letter? I must confess to complete ignorance of its existence, although I have passed several years in Washington, D. C.

"Near Terra Alta in Maryland there is a lake called 'The Unseen Lake.' It is about seven-eighths of a mile in width and about one and one-fourth miles in length. It is completely covered with a kind of sod which is strong enough in some places to bear the weight of a man. It is sometimes called 'Cranberry Lake' because cranberry bushes grow on top of the sod, which is composed of cranberry roots matted together. Fishing has been done by making a hole through the sod with a rail. Nice fish have been caught there."

NEVA SAUER, Marietta, Ohio.

Our next letter needs no introduction from me. Anything connected with Admiral Dewey is eagerly received by all Americans.

"Perhaps the one man in whom the country is most interested to-day is Admiral George Dewey, who was born in this town on Christmas, 1837. Admiral Dewey's father, Dr. J. Y. Dewey, lived in a comfortable house just across the road from the State House, a handsome building of Vermont granite. The house in which Admiral Dewey was born is still standing, but it has been moved from its original site and a new house erected there. In the great Doric portico of the State House, so called because it is built after the Doric style of architecture, there stands a marble statue of Ethan Allen, Vermont's hero in the Revolutionary War. It is proposed now by some of the Admiral's admirers to put a companion statue of Dewey at the other end of this portico.

"The State House stands a good deal higher than the street, and quite a distance back from it. The ground between is laid out rather irregularly in terraces and flights of broad granite steps. People who remember Dewey here when he was a boy tell that one of the plays he was most fond of was to run races with the other boys, from the Capitol down to the street, with their eyes shut, and see who could go the fastest without falling headlong. How surprised he would have been then if he had been told that some day a marble statue of himself might be put up there in the portico, where he was running races."

ALBERT A. PIERCE, Montpelier, Vermont.

If, as the following letter states, egrets' plumes fall out and do not require to be pulled, why does not some enterprising young man or woman start an egret farm? Surely it might be made a paying business.

"Of late years there has been a strong campaign against the decorating of ladies' hats and bonnets with plumes and birds' feathers, and, if report be true, the habit has been dying out; yet, if it had been allowed to continue, it would have led to the founding of a new industry, for egret herons, from which the plumes are taken, can be raised as easily in confinement as fowls or ostriches; while owing to the fact that their plumes fall out every year at the end of the nesting season, there would be no cruelty connected with it.

"My experience with egrets was in the year 1895, when my brother and I secured three white ones from a rookery near our home. The rookery was in a heavy growth of low, broad-branching trees surrounding a small lake. Their nests, which were made of small twigs and stalks, with no padding at all to soften them, were built in the crotches of the trees, six or eight feet from the ground. Each nest contained four light-blue eggs, about the size of a guinea hen's egg. The birds which we took were four or five weeks old, and though unable to fly they gave us a lively chase ere we secured them, scrambling from branch to branch along the tops of the trees, with the agility of monkeys. When we did at last capture them they required careful handling to prevent them from besmearing us with the contents of their crops which they attempted to throw over us.

"On reaching home we placed them in an unused fowl house, and offered them some minnows, which they refused, obliging us to take them one by one and force the food down their throats. In a few days, however, they learned to feed themselves. From the first we uttered a peculiar whistle while feeding them, which they quickly learned to answer and would come hastening from a distance of half a mile on hearing it. As soon as they showed a tendency to fly we clipped their wings, but gave them the run of the place; when we soon found them most useful as insect catchers, they spending most of their time going from plant to plant catching flies and bugs. On approaching a fly they would sway their heads from side to side so rapidly that the eye could scarcely follow, and then, when within an inch or so of the fly would strike with unerring aim. As eaters I have never seen their like. They would eat not only till their crops were full, but until they were full up to the throats, and then would go around for an hour or more with necks stiff with food. It is my belief that an egret can eat two pounds of fish a day.

"At night our egrets would return regularly to their house, and one of their most peculiar traits was their habit of quarreling every evening over possession of the perches. Two or three of them would place themselves at intervals along the perches, and then do their best to keep the others off, although there was plenty of room for all, thrusting at them with their sharp beaks, and uttering their harsh, croaking notes. The others would return the blows with interest, and thus the fight would go on until finally all would succeed in securing places for themselves upon the roosts.

"As summer advanced the egrets began wandering more, and, discovering the river which ran near the place, they went to fishing for themselves, sometimes wandering a mile or more, yet returning every night. With the advent of autumn, however, the migratory instinct was awakened, and they commenced to disappear, and finally one morning a party of tourists, not knowing them to be tame, shot the remnant. We attempted to get others the following spring, intending to be more careful of them, but the rookery had been broken up by plume hunters. We had proved, however, that they could be raised in confinement: they had been interesting pets, and had cost little to keep. They are nearly as good as a watch dog around the place, being very wakeful at night and sounding their resonant cry the moment they hear or see anything unusual."

SAMOA.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

RISING out of the sunny Pacific, thousands of miles from any continent, is the little group of islands (scarcely more than a few dots on the map) which have, for the last ten years, attracted the attention of the three most powerful nations of the earth. The Samoan Navigator Islands lie about ten degrees south of the equator. Their volcanic peaks rise out of the sea to an altitude of four or five thousand feet, the sloping sides of the mountains covered to the very summits with dense forest and undergrowth. Below on the shore are many little coral bays which gleam and glitter in the fierce light of the sun. Everywhere the shore is fringed with coral reefs upon which the breakers beat and roar, curling and tossing their white spray to the foot of the palm trees, which stand like huge ostrich plumes along the shore.

Over all this the sun shines from a sky of marvelous blue, and with a radiance which, it seems, could never be dimmed; but even while one is thinking thus a few clouds scud across the sky and in the twinkling of an eye the heavens are darkened, the wind sweeps all before it, tearing off the limbs of trees and scattering the cocoanuts; the rain falls in torrents—then blue sky again. One does not mind a drenching in this climate, for in a few moments the sun dries the light clothing and the traveller goes on his way quite oblivious of the moisture but happy to have escaped the missiles which have been hurled from the trees into his path.

The natives of Samoa are not cannibals, or black skinned savages, but a people of light brown complexion, semi civilized and of marked intelligence. Their dress is simplicity itself, being composed of a strip of cloth or "lava-lava," made usually of "tapa" or bark cloth, which is wound about the waist and falls to the knees. The upper part of the body is sometimes protected by a blouse but, in the case of the men, the fine chest and splendid muscle are bare and decorated with strings of red berries and moss and garlands of flowers. The Samoans are extremely fond of flowers and weave most beautiful garlands with which to decorate themselves and their houses. On fete days the natives dress in attire of the brightest hues, their bronzed skin shining with cocoanut oil, and their hair dyed and stiffened, and decorated with flowers and berries and sometimes (oh, happy mortal), a piece of looking glass. The high-bred women appear on these occasions wrapped in innumerable mats of which they are as proud as the American lady is of her real old lace and family jewels. These mats are made of pandanus split very fine and woven together so that the mats are sometimes as soft as fur. They are seldom worn save on great occasions, and then they are wrapped about the body, one over the other until the poor human inside is scarcely visible.

Perhaps the most interesting spectacle to a white man is a native feast. Seated under the thatched roof which forms the house of the native, the floor covered with palm leaves and branches of cocoanut palms the guests range themselves in a large circle while in the center spread out upon banana leaves are the viands. And such a quantity! Dozens of pigs (the Samoan delicacy), roasted on hot stones in the ground, chickens and ducks cooked in a similar fashion, taro root and taro leaves cooked with the milk of the cocoanut, bananas and other tropical fruits and vegetables beside fish, fresh from Samoan waters. Of course the feast is innocent of forks and banana leaves make excellent plates. To close the feast the flowing bowl is passed about. This is filled with the national beverage "kava" which is made from grated root and is offered always for hospitality's sake, much as we should offer a guest a cup of tea.

The Samoans are, like all dwellers in tropical lands, a lazy race, yet when occasion arises, they can work well, especially when employed by the white settlers. Their lack of ambition to acquire wealth may be accounted for by their custom of family privilege of appropriation. No man's goods are his own but belong to his family. If he works for a white settler and is presented with some new clothes, when he goes to visit his relatives and they are pleased with the new trumpery, he would not think of refusing to give it to them if they asked. On the other hand he may take from them anything that pleases him. So it would scarcely be politic to work hard and lay up riches, for they would be immediately appropriated by less industrious relatives. In spite of this, perfect civility always prevails among the natives. Perhaps nowhere can we find so courteous a race. "Tolafa" they say as they pass, and whether you be friend or stranger it is the same, "Tolafa," "Love to you." They are extremely generous, and one has but to admire their most highly-prized possession and it is his. But in return the native expects the same generosity.

When ready for war the Samoan blackens his face and goes through most wonderful gambols and contortions indicating how he will treat his enemies. They use spears and sometimes, nowadays, rifles. Their aim is to capture the heads of their victims and bring them back to camp as mementoes of their prowess. In battles again their courtesy is shown, for even during their fiercest struggles women may go unharmed among them. A Samoan would scorn to harm a woman at anytime.

The Catholic Mission has done much for the natives of Samoa, teaching them, not European habits and customs, but a better way of doing their work, and how to lead more useful lives. Most of them are devout Catholics, and with their naturally lovable and sentimental natures they are easily touched by the form and symbolism of the service. They are very musical and the sacred music taught them in the mission as well as their own native songs are beautifully rendered.

But what have we to do with these natives, living their own lives in the South Sea? Some years ago the United States bought, of the native chiefs, the harbor of Pango-Pango for a coaling station. The interests of Germany and England are chiefly commercial and political.

Samoa is really an important position for it is the only neutral group of islands in the Pacific and it is on the course of all steamers from our Pacific coast to Australia. Each year the Pacific Ocean grows more important and now, since the United States has become interested in the Philippines it is especially important that she should have some control in Samoa. After much difficulty among the whites at Apia, the chief town of Samoa, the Germans siding with one native faction, the English and Americans with another, a treaty became necessary. This was the Treaty of Berlin which gave equal power to the three nations, Germany, England and United States, leaving the natives to rule themselves so far as was compatible with the interests of the signatory powers. Trouble arose between the two factions of the natives concerning the crown. Mataafa, a brave chief who had all the titles of royalty, was set aside and his rival, Malietoa Lanpepa, was upheld by the powers.

For a time Mataafa held the position of viceking but soon he was suspected of plotting and, considered dangerous by the powers, he was exiled to Jaluit, one of the Marshall Islands, a dismal place close to the equator, where he and his companions suffered terribly. In the latter part of 1898 Lanpepa died and Mataafa, returning from his exile, expected to be acknowledged by the powers as king. Judge Chambers of Georgia, Chief Justice of the islands, after carefully studying the history of the royal family decided in favor of Malietoa Tanu, son of the late king. The Germans took the part of Mataafa, though formerly they had been his worst enemy, and fighting was inevitable. Apia was attacked by the rebels and marines were landed from the warships to protect the consulates. The British warship Porpoise and the American cruiser Philadelphia shelled the native villages along the shore and the cause of Mataafa seemed on the wane. The affair will probably be settled by another treaty between the three powers giving more definite directions for the action of the white government in relation to the natives.

A sketch of Samoa would not be complete without mention of the author and poet who spent his last days in the lovely climate and who has made known to us the beauties of the place. Robert Louis Stevenson was the beloved of the natives. His home, Vailima, high on the mountain above Apia, was often visited by deputations from the native chiefs who came to ask of their beloved "Tusitola" (the teller of tales) advice on matters of state. He understood the natives and possessed their complete confidence. He would leave no stone unturned to help them in their troubles and, often, at the expense of the goodwill of white officials, acted as an intermediary for them with the Chief Justice and consuls. At one time several of the chiefs were imprisoned for political reasons and Stevenson did everything in his power to alleviate their sufferings and save them from death by disease. After their release they expressed in a most substantial manner their appreciation of his good offices. They built for him a road to the town, bringing the material often from the shore with much labor, and providing themselves at the same time with food and shelter, so that no expense should fall upon their benefactor. Stevenson named this "The Road of Gratitude," and it will stand for many years, a monument to the beautiful affection which may exist between the Samoan and the white man.

EDIBLE BIRDS' NESTS.

WE have all of us heard of bird's-nest soup—that peculiar dish so esteemed by the Chinese. Few of us, however, have any idea of the kind of nest used, or anything about where it is to be found, and how it is collected.

The edible bird's nest is not a mass of sticks, straws, and feathers, plastered together with clay or mud, such as the robin's nest, for instance. The method of their manufacture is unique. The swallow who builds the nest is provided with glands that secrete a peculiar sticky substance which hardens quickly upon exposure to the air. No other bird is so provided, though among insects, as we all know, the spider is so equipped.

These swallows inhabit the cliffs in the Sunda Islands, Ceylon, Borneo, and Java, where the birds inhabit large caves over-looking the sea, and in colonies of countless thousands build their homes and rear their young.

When about to build the nest the bird's glands, which are situated under the tongue, become greatly swollen. The swallow presses its tongue against the rock that is to serve as the foundation of the nest, and then retreats a short distance, in so doing drawing a glutinous thread out of its mouth. This is woven into a bed of web, by dexterous movements of the bird's head, and the operations of spinning and weaving are continued until the nest is of the required size and shape. The completed nest is about the size of a quarter of a hen's egg.

The best quality of nests are white and as translucent as porcelain, and are much prized by Oriental epicures. Another species is of a brown color, but is mixed with bits of sticks, feathers, and other foreign substances which render it almost useless as an article of diet. Probably either species would not prove especially attractive to an American palate.

The natives who gather the nests often live in the larger caves with the swallows. As the openings to these caves are often sixty feet high and between forty and fifty feet wide, it can be seen that the men do not frighten the birds in the least. They do not even seem to mind the loss of their nests, but keep on building year after year in the most contented fashion.

In gathering the nests two men work together. One carries a torch, for the inner recesses of the cave are totally dark, the other is equipped with a long-handled, four-pronged spear. By means of a light bamboo ladder they ascend to the roof of the cave. The man with the spear selects the nest he wants, spears it, and with a slight twist disengages it from the rock whole. He passes it down to his companion, who puts it in a basket at his waist. The nests of the best quality are tied with strips of bamboo into bundles, weighing about a pound and a half each, and containing about forty nests. These bundles are worth about nine dollars each. The poorer grade of nests are nicely strung together, and are not nearly as valuable.

About $2,500 worth of these nests are gathered every year, three crops being taken during the season. Though this occupation of nest-gathering has flourished for over seven generations, or considerably over one hundred years, so numerous are the swallows, and so rapidly do they breed, that there seems to be not the slightest diminution in the number of birds inhabiting these caves.

Should it prove that the English sparrow is any relation to these birds, what a hopeless task is before Bostonians and others who hope to exterminate the pests by destroying their nests!

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

TO the chick of the present day, born in an incubator, the old saw, "What is home without a mother," has lost all meaning. He lives quite comfortably without the "cluck, cluck" of the old biddy and has grown quite accustomed to furnace heat instead of the warm feathers of mother hen. In hatching chickens by artificial means many difficulties must be overcome. Now let us see how it is in the case of hatching fish in the hatcheries. Almost all fish are born from eggs and these receive no attention from the mother after they are deposited on the bottom of the brook, so the difficulties to be overcome in this direction are less than in the case of the chickens. Then again one female often lays as many as several thousand eggs, about ninety per cent. of which are destroyed or fail to be fertilized. By artificial incubation not more than four per cent. are lost, so that hatching by artificial means has proved to be far superior to natural courses.

Uncle Sam, with his eye always open to improvement, has carefully noted all these facts, and has taken advantage of them, using every precaution to save the eggs and tend them so carefully that the largest possible proportion shall hatch into fish. All over our country collecting stations and fish hatcheries have been established for the propagation of our native fish. This work is under the management of the United States Fish Commission, which is one of the youngest departments of our government. Cars especially constructed for the purpose carry the eggs and fish from one end of the country to the other, so that it often happens that the eggs of the salmon of California and Oregon are hatched in Maine or vice versa.

That the waters of the United States may become well stocked with fine fish the Commission is very generous to individuals, and anyone who has a pond of proper size and in good condition may, upon application, have it stocked with fish from the fish farms of Uncle Sam, free of expense. Thus the fish used for food are well distributed and sport is promoted in all parts of the country. The angler need have no fear that the brooks and lakes of our sporting areas will become "fished out" while the government is so generous with its fresh supplies of fish.

The land-locked salmon are the fish most popular among sportsmen and much is done toward their increase at the fish hatcheries. About November they begin to spawn and, if allowed their freedom, the female seeks the shallow streams where she deposits her eggs upon the gravelly bottom of the brook. She is followed by the male who spreads upon the eggs the soft roe or milt, which fertilizes them or rather some of them, for by the natural method the milt fails to reach a large per cent. of the eggs and they are lost. It is for this reason that nature has made such a bountiful provision of eggs from each female trout, and man now takes advantage of this provision to fill his rivers with these dainty fish. In the hatcheries the female fish, when she tries to escape from the lake, is trapped and placed in a large tank or pound, from which she can be taken in a landing net. She is then stripped of her eggs. An expert, holding the fish by the tail, determines whether it is ripe for delivery; then holding it over a pan he presses the body gently until the eggs drop out, often to the number of eight or ten thousand. The fish is then returned, unharmed to the lake. The milt is taken from the male in a similar way and is thoroughly mixed with the eggs, so that every healthy egg is fertilized and yields a fish. The eggs of the salmon are at first not more than a quarter of an inch in diameter, but then afterward they soak up much water and increase in size. They are now placed on large frames through which a stream of water is constantly passing. In this condition they appear like a great mass of glass beads ready to be strung. For about three months the eggs remain on the frames. They require no nourishment but plenty of fresh air and water.

When the tiny fish first emerges from the egg he is nourished by the little sac of the egg which is still attached to him, but when he begins to develop fins and swim about like a true fish he must be fed with soft meat. When six months old the fish are called "fishlings" and in this state many of them are transported from their birthplace to other lakes in far off states. They are taken up in landing nets and placed in large cans, about one hundred to a can, and these are fastened securely in the Fish Commission car. The only requisite for the journey is plenty of cool air and this is obtained in part by dipping the water out and letting it fall again. This work is done more effectively, however, by an air pump, which is constantly pumping the air into the cans through rubber tubes with minute openings at the ends, through which the air enters the water without causing disturbance, and giving perfect aeration. Food for the salmon is unnecessary for they can live a week or more without apparently suffering for want of it.

The fishlings, when taken from the lakes for transportation are not more than six inches long, but under right conditions they will grow at the rate of a pound a year until they are the delight of the sportsman.

It has been estimated that at one hatching over two million fish can be propagated in a single year. Of course these cannot be accommodated in one lake and so they are distributed at an early age, to other lakes and ponds and streams.

The future of this good work of our government is most promising. The food supply of our country is being greatly increased and sport is being promoted not only along those streams and lakes which have always been famous for trout, but in new and formerly unattractive regions. Then again the fishing is immensely improved by the introduction of fish not native to the region in which they are hatched, and by the general interchange of kind and quality.

Bank Accounts For Children.

TO do the very best thing possible for your child, in a material way," said a wise father, "is to start him with a ten dollar savings bank account when he is one day old." The writer knows of several instances in which this advice has been followed or anticipated and the results have been uniformly gratifying. Let me recount one case.

Arthur Lane had ten dollars deposited to his credit the day he was born, in a savings bank paying four per cent. interest, compounding semi-annually. At the same time he was guaranteed by his parents an allowance of ten cents per week up to his tenth year, twenty-five cents per week from his tenth to his sixteenth year, and one dollar per week from his twenty-first year. Up to his sixth year this allowance was deposited to his credit entire. Then, the nature and value of a bank account having been explained to him, he was encouraged to voluntarily save and deposit as much of his allowance per week as he felt inclined to, in view of the advantages to accrue therefrom. On each birthday, beginning with the second, two dollars were deposited for him as a birthday gift. In addition to these increments, he was urged to earn and deposit for himself such sums as an active boy may without detriment to school work or wholesome recreation. When Arthur was twenty-one years old he found that he had enough money in the bank to take him to college and pay most of his expenses there for two years. He kept on earning and saving during his college life—adding to his bank account as well as subtracting from it, and finally graduated without having called upon his father for a single penny. The lesson in practical economics was worth more to him than a gift of the same amount of money could possibly have been. He had learned the value of money—how to make it, how to save it, and how to use it—and all this at such an infinitesimal and wisely distributed cost to his parents that although in straitened circumstances for a time the financial drain was scarcely perceptible to them.

The wisdom of making boys and girls their own bankers is sustained by so many practical considerations that I wonder the custom is not universal among provident and thrifty parents. Start your children off with ten dollars apiece and you will be amazed to see how their bank accounts will grow. Interest subtly adds itself to principal, and the sum total goes on rolling up and increasing in an astonishing ratio. And it will not be long before your boys and girls will catch the spirit of the enterprise and add their efforts to its furthering with a wholesome pride and enthusiasm. One does not realize how much money actually passes through the average child's hands, until a tally is kept of it by some such method as this. Let the allowances and gifts and earnings, that otherwise would melt away immediately and without perceptible results—unless, perhaps, of a disagreeable nature—be registered, at least in part, by a savings bank account under the child's own management, and in the course of a few years they will represent an amount which is as surprising as it is encouraging.

Some one may object that bank accounts for boys and girls would develop in them an undue and perhaps corrupting love of money. At first glance there might seem to be some plausibility in this objection. But maturer reflection, backed by practical results, will refute it. Depositing money in a savings bank is not like hoarding it in a miserly way. It is an investment. The laws of financial growth and use apply to it. It is also subject to the risks and fluctuations of all working capital. The whole process is educative, stimulating and broadening to the mind. It is no more morally injurious for a child to watch and control, in his small way, the productive forces of the business world, than to watch and control the productive forces of nature in making a garden. It is an enterprise that is entirely normal, legitimate and instructive—something vital, to which a young person must come sooner or later, in the constitution of things, and which he is advantaged by knowing something about at an early period in his education.

Then too, wise parents in teaching their children the value of money will impress upon them from the outset the fact that money in itself is worthless. Its wonderful power is manifested only when it is used as a medium of exchange. We save it to use it, and to use it in the best and most effective ways, if we save it rightly.

Practical results also show that children are not made miserly or even avaricious by the management of small bank accounts of their own. They are made economical and careful about the use of money, but they do not forget that its final and essential function is to be used. Nearly every child with a bank account has some definite and cherished object in view, some wise and often far-reaching purpose for which he or she is saving. And, in the end, the money is invariably applied to a good use, something that furthers the young person's success in life.

If parents and friends in making presents to children would only, instead of giving perishable knicknacks and toys give the value of such things in money, and encourage the little people to put it where it will grow and amount to something of real, solid benefit by and by, how much better off all of us—excepting the toy dealers—would be! But if that is asking too much self-denial of the children, why not educate them into foregoing a toy now and then by giving them the money such things would cost and letting them choose between the sorry wreck of former indulgences and the glory of so much more credit at the bank?

Electricity no longer the master but the servant of man, represents to us light, heat and force. By these three great powers everything on earth lives and electricity means life. This grand machine is a combined motor and dynamo and gives a perfect electric organization. Most interesting and instructive of the recent products of electrical science; teaches and instructs while it amuses, young and old alike. Scientific in construction and no student or ingenious boy should be without it. Perfectly harmless, but produces no end of fun, by giving shocks to circles and many harmless tricks. FOR A HOME CURER. Doctors know almost every known disease and pain yields readily to electrical currents. The cost of electric batteries as generally sold places them far beyond reach of any but the wealthy. This Electrical Machine has been produced by the latest and most improved machinery and at nominal cost as compared with the expensive batteries formerly sold at $8, $10 or $20 each. The great improvements in machinery enables us to produce this and to offer it to you for a mere trifle. See What Electricity is Used For. There is no disease of the nerves or any bodily pain which will not yield readily to electric currents. This wonderful machine utilizes the forces of nature; drives out Rheumatic Pains, Neuralgia and every species of blood and nerve disease; Cures Weakness of every kind and nature and restores youthful health and vigor. Works like a miracle for that worn out feeling and languor and despondency and strengthening nervous system with a direct (not alternating) current, large in volume but pleasant to take, no shock or irritation. Patent switch adjusts current to weakest child or strongest man. A valuable treatise by Dr. Cutten accompanies every machine shipped. We now place nature's great restorative agent, Electricity, within the reach of every sufferer rich or poor.

The National Reunion of the Blue and the Gray occurs at Indianapolis, Ind., in the early part of this month. Nowhere else in the world can such a scene be witnessed as this friendly meeting of the survivers of a great civil conflict. It always carries with it an object lesson on the sterling good sense and candid judgment of the American people. The nation as a real living entity did not exist until the national spirit rose from the hundred battle grounds of the Blue and the Gray. The sins of these men have opened a future to the nation—a future through whose vista only the most daring can look. The numbers of those who made the nation one, grow fewer and fewer with each yearly reunion. This common interest in the present war and common heirships in the great results of our latest victims show more closely than ever before to the men of the Blue and the men of the Gray what their conflict meant. They rejoice together that the victory of the Blue and the defeat of the Gray meant a united nation—a nation which should in less than a generation carry the national emblem in triumph around the world.

When "Society" with its capital "S" takes seriously to any sport, sensible discussion of the matter is at an end until "Society" takes its frantic seriousness in some other direction. The bicycle had its brief whirl and then the social columns ignored its existence. Golf and automobiles have been the social fad of the summer of 1899. Indications seem to point to the conclusion that the automobiles would "arrive" as a business convenience before they became a fashionable fad. For the last few years frequenters of Broadway have been familiar with the sight of the horseless carriage standing forlorn and empty at the curbstone. Rarely was it seen in motion and more rarely with an occupant. This summer it was hard to find one of these vehicles and those curious to know what an "automobile" ride was like frequently had to postpone a gratification of their curiosity. The world of fashion began to purchase "automobiles." It is an expensive luxury—this new fad of the fashionable, and as such may enjoy a longer vogue than the wheel. The gulf between one thousand dollars and one hundred dollars may insure a corresponding ratio in the length of time that fashionable interest will be directed towards the new method of locomotion. In time this interest will subside and automobile parties will be a thing of the past. The trip being made across the continent will demonstrate the practical use of this new wagon of the day. The man and his wife who started from New York to spend their summer on this trip, have awakened much interest along their entire route. Automobiles are still excluded from the park drives in most of our large cities. There is a great artistic opportunity for a change in the construction of these vehicles. At present they are ugly and ungainly. There is none of the "smartness" of a fashionable turnout discernible in these heavy-wheeled, abbreviated-looking affairs. If Fashion during the brief sunshine of her fever can change the shape of automobiles into a thing of beauty they may become a "joy forever," as they certainly will become a necessity.

One of the most hopeful signs of the last few years is the lavish festival of wealth in philanthropic and altruistic schemes. Schools, colleges and libraries are forwarded and endowed on every hand. It is an age of vast fortunes but it is an age in which individual responsibility seems to have developed in a high degree. Andrew Carnegie is a striking example of the responsibility of wealth. That a man should retire from business at the height of success is still something of an anomaly in America but that he should avow a purpose of devoting his life to the wise distributions of his wealth is an anomaly in any age or time. He is only one of many who are spending time, brain power and effort in the endeavor to make their wealth of great benefit to the world. The greater part of the benefit is however reaped by the cities. In the great centers of population opportunities for education and enjoyment are at the disposal of all. In a great measure this is an unfair distribution of pleasure. There are hundreds of people in the rural districts fairly hungering and thirsting for the opportunity to hear good music, to see good pictures, to read good books. No millionaire has yet devised a scheme to brighten the monotony of these lives that are lived far from the great centers. Some states have made efforts along the lines of a traveling library and traveling exhibitions of prints and reproductions of great pictures, but while this work has met with appreciation and co-operation from the public whom it designs to benefit, the work has hardly begun. A well-organized system by means of which a few really fine paintings might be exhibited free of charge in all the rural districts would unfold a new world to many. It has been said that we look at Nature in an entirely different manner after we have seen it reproduced on the canvas of a great artist. We begin to look for tints and shades that we never saw before but that the artist's eye has caught. Nature takes a new meaning when we search for the beauties that only trained eyes have seen. Why should the libraries, the gymnasiums and the lectures be provided only for the dwellers in great cities? There are plans to enrich and beautify life in the city; these should be extended to the country.

The failure of the legislatures of Pennsylvania, Utah, California and Delaware to elect United States Senators has caused some serious complications and many discussions as to the interpretation of the Constitution on this point. The power of the governor to fill such vacancies by appointment is seriously questioned. Such dead locks are only possible when the state legislature has the power to appoint. It was the idea of the makers of the Constitution that the United States Senate should represent the states as units. This unity and sovereignty of the states would be better upheld by men owing their power to the law-making body of their several states. The election by State Legislation was the result. There have been many discussions of the wisdom of amending the Constitution in this point and such political broils as these cases of non-election of senators but emphasize the necessity for a change. It is a relation of the right of a state to leave it unrepresented in the councils of the nation and especially so at a transition period like that of the present. On the other hand the most critical students of the Constitution believe that it provides no lawful method of disposing of cases like the ones cited—in other words that the governor of the state has no power to appoint in such cases. The simple remedy that would prevent any such occurrences in the future is a constitutional amendment throwing the choice of United States Senators directly upon the voters of the state. The opportunity for political "deals" and double dealing would be materially lessened by such a method. The most marked feature of governmental development since 1789 has been the strengthening of the legislative branches of the government and the endeavor to make these bodies reflect the sentiments of the people. Under this development the English House of Lords has become of little governmental importance. Our Senate would more truly reflect the people of the state if elected by them directly instead of indirectly through the legislature. The people should rebuke the political chicanery that leaves them without a legal voice in the Senate of the United States, and they should rebuke by taking into their own hands the delegated power to select men to represent the state.

The American nation has reason to feel proud of its great naval victories. From the time that John Paul Jones, with his unseaworthy Bon Homme Richard, snatched victory from two British ships down to the July day when Cervera's torn and dismantled fleet lay on the rocks of Cuba, the American navy has had victories by sea far in advance of its expectation or expenditure of money. Now we mean to have a navy that will be fitting our rank as a nation. Much discussion has been aroused as to the proper naming of this new navy. About ten years ago Secretary of the Navy Tracy adopted a certain plan for naming our ships which up to that time had been christened in a haphazard manner. He proposed to name battleships after states, cruisers after our great cities, armored coast defenders after celebrated events in our history, and torpedo boats after naval heroes. This seemed like some kind of an orderly arrangement but the recent violation of it by naming four coast defenders after the states of Connecticut, Arkansas, Florida and Wyoming, has provoked much unfavorable comment in those states. The technical distinction between the importance of ships is one not understood by the people at large. The most obvious thing about a ship is size and when we find the boat named for the state of Texas really smaller than the one named for the borough of Brooklyn, the comment of the Texas people is not pleasant to hear. It is certain that some recognized system of naming should be adopted but it is exceedingly doubtful if any patriotic advantage is gained by giving local names to national ships. It is not municipal or state pride that we wish to foster but national pride. Give the names of great victories like Saratoga, Yorktown, etc., to the ships, give the names of men prominent in our military history or of great statesmen. If geographical names must be used adopt some of the native Indian names like Cherokee, Seminole, Iroquois, Seneca, Cayuga, or the like. The names of our cities are not American names. New York was the title of the Duke of York, Boston and Newark are from English towns of that name. Cincinnati in a sense is American as it was named after the Society of the Cincinnatus, but its origin is in Roman history. The names of a large number of our states are of European origin. Let us have names that will serve as a guide to the rank of the ship and at the same time as an object lesson that the American people have a history that they are proud to commemorate.

OLD DOMINION.

TWO STEP.

W. G. WILMARTH.

Copyright, 1897, by HENRY WHITE, Washington, D. C.

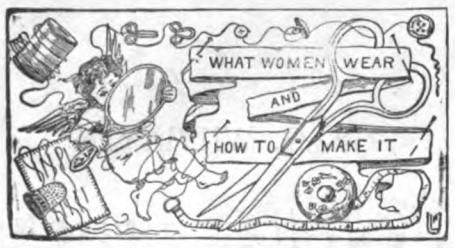
F. H. GILSON COMPANY, MUSIC TYPOGRAPHERS, BOSTON, U. S. A.

The Popularity of the Two-Step.

Music dealers everywhere are much interested to watch the gradual forcing out of the waltz by the popular two-step and publishers assert that only about two-thirds as much waltz music is now sold as was a year ago. When the two-step was first introduced as a dance it was met with decided disfavor by waltzers and dancers generally, who sneered at the idea of a dance which could be picked up by any one in half an hour ever being considered popular. Another class of people frowned upon it on account of the rompish character of the dance and regretted that what they were pleased to call an undignified scramble should be successful. Also much opposed were dancing-masters who had labored long and faithfully to perfect dancers in intricate steps and figures. Notwithstanding all of this opposition the two-step has been popular with dancers from the start and the swing, rhythm and exercise are well in keeping with the modern idea that women should have and enjoy exercise and sports as well as men. The day has gone by when it is fashionable or proper form for a woman to pose as an invalid or without sufficient strength for good wholesome pleasure and exercise. Another thing that has made the two-step so popular has been the general catchiness of the music, especially those composed by Sousa and the host of followers. So many of these two-steps have been brought before the public that one that commands immediate attention has to be of extra great merit. The Old Dominion which is published above is a remarkably fine and swinging example of the music of this popular dance, as will be seen by every reader who looks over the score. It is a piece that without being up to Sousa's great masterpieces in this line, is a piece that will attract immediate attention and grows upon the player or hearer every time it is repeated. It is a very creditable piece and worthy of high praise.

FOR MUSIC LOVERS.

A Modern Way to Obtain Splendid Music for Your Piano or Organ.



COMFORT has often pointed out the great revolution which has taken place in the music world within a few years. Even our youngest readers can easily remember when the only sheet music to be had came from the music stores, while once in a while could be obtained at a fairly low price a poorly-printed collection of well-worn relics in the musical line. The idea of getting real sheet music at low prices never seems to have received much attention until recently, although books and paper were cheaper and wonderful printing presses had been designed that brought the art down to speed and accuracy never before dreamed of, and at a minimum cost. Finally COMFORT took up the idea of first-class music being printed by modern methods. The result was as might have been expected, the idea was opposed and belittled by the very ones whom it was designed to benefit. So accustomed had people become to paying monopoly prices that for some time little headway was made. Pretty soon it became noised abroad that the best of sheet music was being offered by COMFORT for a trifle, although people were before paying fifty cents to one dollar for exactly the same thing. Now the price has been lowered everywhere and while none pretend to meet COMFORT in its generous offer, but few dare to suggest former prices for sheet music. If you or any friend want the best of sheet music read our music offer on another page; but do not think of paying music-store prices until you have tried our offer once. If everything is not as presented we will return every cent it has cost you. The most difficult thing is to convince those who have not seen the music that it is all we say; and yet every day brings such letters as Lucia Robbins, Box 44, Waverly, Mo., sends. She writes: "I received the music and it is all right and just as you advertise. Am very well pleased with it. I have thought the same music at higher price was cheap; but I never struck such a sale as this." Nor is this any more emphatic than just a word from Miss Stella Beag, Mentor, Minn. "The music I received is very nice. I should have had to pay from twenty-five cents to half a dollar a sheet here." Do as we suggest and make one trial of our offer.

Commenting on the large sums that are now paid to the best opera singers, the profession generally feels that Henry Abbey and Henry Jarrett are largely responsible for it, as they both have been instrumental in this material recognition of vocal merit. Jarrett gave Christine Nilsson, the famous "Swedish Nightingale" $1000 a night to sing at Drury Lane theater in London, whereupon Patti's sum went up to $2000 a night for her performances in Convent Garden. Not satisfied with this large advance over all previous records she stipulated for and received $5000 a night in her next American tour. But speaking of large salaries for musical performances leads COMFORT to note that in both of these cases the vocalists have been aided by other artists and the accessories that go to make up the modern opera company. Now the record is really broken by the pianist, Ignace Paderewski, who many of our readers have heard give his marvelous performances on the piano. Alone and unaided he often makes $5000 for a single evening and on one occasion cleared $7000 for his performances on the afternoon and evening of one day. Cartoonists may amuse themselves and others with their caricatures of this artist but we reverently take off our hat to any man who is able to do this.

Abroad where music receives general recognition and aid as an art it is not an unusual sight to see a monument erected to some living or deceased artist or composer. In Italy a beautiful one has been erected by the general government to the memory of Guiseppe Gabetti. He was the director of the military music of the Piedmontese Infantry bands and composed for them a march which has become as famous as it is popular. The King was so pleased with this particular composition that he ordered it to be used perpetually in greeting any member of the royal family in public, the same as "Hail to the Chief" is used in this country as a greeting to the President or other high officials. On account of this incident Gabetti's March is now known as "The King's March" and is used whenever there is any public appearance of the King, though its use for other members of the family has been gradually dropped in favor of the head of the house, for whom it is now played exclusively.

An Opportunity Not to be Lost.

Sheet music at about cost of mailing ought to interest every person who pays the old-time prices to music dealers. The opportunity to obtain sheet music practically for the postage is given in COMFORT'S music offer in this number. It is a chance music-buyers should not lose.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE fashion of wearing a coat or a blouse made of a different color and material to the skirt is decidedly economical, as it costs very little to produce a smart-looking costume in this way. Lace revers and collars in an endless variety of designs help to make a coat or jacket look very stylish. The lace could be mounted onto a piece of ivory satin or any color that matches the lining foundation would look very smart.

All the newest skirts continue to be tight-fitting round the hips but vary in width at the hem. The best shape for ordinary wear measures a little over three and one-quarter yards in circumference, and is certainly the most perfect hanging skirt that has ever been introduced. It is a particularly easy style for the amateur to make, as there are no small gores to be added on at the hem, for each piece is within the width of ordinary double-width material.

An especially stylish skirt has the regular gores divided into two sections, each section outlined with a narrow beading of jet, ending with an ornament running into a deep scallop connecting each gore around the foot which has a decided flare. This is extremely modish when made up in taffeta or liberty satin.

Double skirts are very popular, but very different from the ordinary idea of a double skirt. The upper skirt being within a few inches as long as the underskirt. All skirts ripple around the feet; indeed in the present "pull-back" fashion, walking would be seriously interfered with were this not so. The shops are showing very beautiful skirts for dressy wear having a long, trailing foundation of soft, pliant satin, with a fall of chiffon covering it, and finished with pleatings of the thin stuff at the edge, and over all the outer skirt of Brussels net thickly sewn with jet sequins interspersed with quillings of net. They are all very long, clinging, and trailing, and accompanying them are patterns for the bodice to be made according to the taste of the purchaser. This goes to show how much importance is given the skirt of this season; far exceeding that of the bodice.

Well, I have just been looking at the most bewildering lot of fall and winter millinery it ever fell to the lot of mortal to see, and right here in our own New York. You would decide at once you must be in Paris, that no such splendid collection of exquisite creations could have originated elsewhere; but I am proud to see that we can do something over here, and with a little encouragement may yet be acknowledged as leaders. Of course a great deal depends upon the face beneath the hat and I happened fortunately to see the daintiest sort of a pretty girl pose in each and every one of these, more tantalizing in every one. Not only are these hats which are to be our leading modes, gorgeous and daring, but unusually practical. Many of them are after the fashion of the turkish turban, the material velvet, panne silk, or soft felt cloth arranged in thick folds in a low flat fashion, in which grebe breasts and ospreys are introduced with fine effect. Fur is elaborately applied to the most costly hats; mink, otter and chinchilla being the most popular, as well as the most becoming. All shades of pink are lavishly used and are wonderfully effective. I saw such a sweet hat of black velvet, with a rather high crown, and perfectly straight brim, the top heavy with black birds and soft paradise plumes, while under the brim was draped a beautiful shade of soft pink satin ribbon ending in a full bow at the left of the back, to fall over the hair. Purples and grays are very much in vogue, while the newest of the new is the vivid claret red so many of the new hats are made of. It is immensely becoming to a clear-skinned brunette. A certain brownish shade of crushed strawberry is also to the fore, and combines effectively with jet. Turquoise blue and castor is a favorite combination while any and every combination shows a tower of black. Some of the fanciful black hats, enormous things, show one scarf end of tulle or lace to wind about the throat.

Everything in millinery is enormously heavy, trimmings heaped on without rhyme or reason, seemingly.

Very little radical change is seen in jackets or coats. Sleeves are snug, and bodies are short, especially so over the hips, very often longer at the back and front, and more often longer in the front than any place. Slanting double-breasts are much worn, the usual width being retained at the top, while a single button closes it in the center at the bottom. All edges and corners, in fact, every possible point is scalloped. There are no square edges. Open fronted coats and short-waisted jackets are still the very height of fashion, and all of them are shaped into the figure at back. The introduction of a side piece to an Eton is a great improvement, and permits of the shape being more generally adopted, as in its old form an Eton jacket was very unsuitable for many figures.

The sketch selected sets forth a novel gown in soft wool in palest violet made over an underskirt of black satin set in circular ruffles, while flat bands of the satin intersected with lace ornament the bodice. The overdress, which has much the effect of a princess is brought tight to the figure by means of small tucks, ending in a point at the bottom to give the needed flare.

Two pretty ideas for the school girls are shown. One being a frock of royal blue wool, with fine corded tucks and knife pleating by way of trimming, and the other a smart little surplice bodice, with a satin collar effect at the back.

A MEXICAN MEAL.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

IN the Bible we read of "two women grinding at the mill," but that was in Palestine, two thousand years ago, and in the light of our modern machinery we scarcely comprehend just what it was that those women were doing. But if we go to Mexico today, we will comprehend, for we will see not only two, but thousands of women grinding at the mill just as did those of Bible times, the only difference being, that instead of the wheaten loaf, they will be preparing to bake the tortilla, a thin cake made from Indian corn, without yeast.

First softening the corn by soaking it in water, the women spread it out on a flat stone, called a matate, and with another stone shaped like a rolling pin, crush it into a paste. When this paste or dough is of the proper consistency, it is patted by hands that are not necessarily clean into thin cakes, and baked to a rubber-like inpermeability on another flat stone.

In the meantime, the ever-present frijole (bean) has been simmering in a pot, and is now ready for eating. A formal announcement that dinner is served is not necessary, for the men of the family are lounging about not far away, smoking cigarettes, and the lifting of the pot from the fire is the signal for all to gather about it.

Each person takes a tortilla, and deftly moulding it into the form of a rude plate, fills it with beans from the pot, using another tortilla doubled into the form of a scoop. Then transferring the beans by means of the scoop from his plate to his mouth, he complacently eats his meal. When he has about satisfied his hunger, he eats first the scoop, then the plate, and if he be fastidious, uses another tortilla for a napkin, and then that also is eaten. Thus it is seen that neither linen nor dishes are left for the women to wash—a slight recompense for their labor at the mill.

Three times a day, from time immemorial, this has been the bill of fare of the poorer Mexicans. Plain and unvaried fare, you say. Yes, but there are those, still poorer, to whom it is a luxury, it being said of them, that they eat the beans of the mesquite (a small tree) raw, for breakfast, drink water for dinner, and allow the resultant swelling of the beans to take the place of supper.

ESPECIALLY STYLISH.

HOW many women know why they wear their wedding ring on the third finger of the left hand? The Egyptians believed that that particular finger was connected by a slender nerve with the heart itself. The worshippers of Isis held this finger sacred to Apollo and the sun, for which reason gold was the metal chosen for the ring. The first authentic reference to finger rings occurs in the Old Testament, where the signet-ring of Judah is mentioned. Rings were originally used more for practical purposes than for ornament. They were used for sealing.

HOW ONE OF OUR LADY READERS MAKES A GOOD LIVING.

I have noticed the different ways in which some of your readers have been making money, and I wish now to give my experience. I am selling Baird's Non-Alcoholic Flavoring Powders, never making less than $3 a day, and I often times clear over $5. These powders are much cheaper than the liquids and they go twice as far. From one to eight different flavors can be sold at most every house for flavoring ice cream, custards, cakes, candies, etc., and they give to any delicacy in which they are put that richness of flavor so common to the fruits and flowers they represent. Guaranteed to be perfectly healthful, I have not any trouble selling them, as everyone who sees them tried buys them. By writing to W. H. Baird & Co., 288 Telephone Bldg., Pittsburg, Pa., they will give you full particulars and give you a start. I give my experience, hoping that others who are in need of employment can do as well as I have.

Possibilities of a Cheap Trip to the Paris Exposition.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THERE is a possibility—but not a probability that one can go to the Paris Exposition on a small amount of money. Whatever the trip would cost you this year it is safe to say that the rates will be doubled for 1900. Indeed, the French people expect to make a fortune off the Americans during their coming carnival.

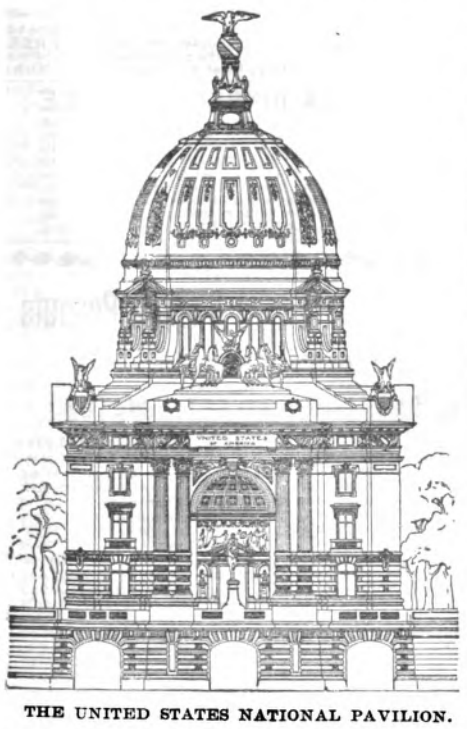
In conversation with a number of the keepers of Pensions, they distinctly stated their rates would be doubled, so that if a schedule of rates now is quoted, it will give the reader some idea of the coming year.

In the Latin Quarter, which has its center around the Jardin de Luxembourg, a room for two people can be had from forty francs ($8.00) up, per month, and if one gets one's meals at the restaurants, a good average is two francs (forty cents) a meal. This is much the preferable way to live, for you can have your meals where you are sight-seeing and not have to return to your boarding house. Besides, the Continental breakfast, which consists of a bowl of abominable coffee or chocolate and a roll, is not sufficient nourishment for a tourist.

If you choose to live in a Pension or boarding house you can obtain accommodation now, from thirty-five francs ($7.00) upward. This way of living has so many drawbacks that in the end it costs as much as living in an apartment. The food is scant and has to be supplemented every day from your other funds, and if you lose a meal nothing is deducted, but if you have a friend to dine you are charged extra.

The Latin Quarter is the center for American Art students and you can readily find apartments where both English and French are spoken. It is the cheap quarter too, so that if you choose to live nearer the Exposition grounds or in the more aristocratic section of the great city, even now the rates are much higher.

But your living is a small part of your expense. The "tip" or "pour boire" is paid for everything. It amounts to a tenth of every bill except the cab fare. This is one and five-tenths francs (thirty cents) and the pour boire is twenty-five centimes (five cents). This wretched system has been recognized by law and you must pay, no matter how unjust or how unnecessary it may seem to you.



If you intend to go to the Paris Exposition in a cheap way, begin to get ready now. Learn to write some French even though you can't speak the language. Obtain some French money and learn to count it, and make change rapidly. Join the great Cycling Club of France. By all means take a wheel. It will cost a little something but nothing to compare to cab fares, and you will have a method of conveyance when you most need it. It is said there are twenty thousand cabs in Paris, but we could never get one of the twenty thousand after any great affair or even on Sunday afternoon. Have your wheel painted some distinguishing color with some marks or hieroglyphics known to yourself, so that when you check it you will be sure to have your own wheel returned to you.

The same spirit that makes a Frenchman take a "tip" when he has rendered no service makes it a pleasure to him to exchange a fine, beautiful American wheel for a clumsy European affair.

Take a passport, a circular letter of credit, and, if possible, a circular Consular letter issued by the Department of State in Washington. Write now to the American Consul in Paris asking him to send you copies of newspapers printed in English in Paris, and from these you will get many addresses and ideas of expense.

As a matter of course you will send a fee to pay for obtaining the papers and to remunerate him for the services rendered. There is no set fee, I believe, but do not be niggardly about this, for all you can learn in advance saves both energy, money, and time after you arrive.

If you have any friends who can introduce and vouch for you to "The Women's Rest Tour Association," 264 Boylston Street, Boston, Mass., you can get great help from them. This is an organization of cultivated women and in no way a money-making institution. It is, therefore, conservative, and rightly so, but once within its charmed environment the cockle shell it presents to you is an open sesame to everything you want to know of travel.

THE UNITED STATES NATIONAL PAVILION.

As to the money question in its totality. When you arrive in Paris you will need now at the very least five dollars a day. During the Exposition double your allowance. With reasonable precaution you can carry what you will need during a short stay. When you buy anything and receive change in return, take your time in counting it over. Do not pick up a single piece until you have made a mental calculation. You may if you choose, put your index finger on the money to separate it so you may the more easily count it, but don't take up a single piece until you are sure you have been properly paid.

If you speak a little French do not be disconcerted by the rapid reply that will be given you in an unintelligible manner. Simply say in French, "Speak more slowly, if you please." You may have to say this several times and if you do so, at the same time displaying a copper, you can in the end get good information spoken slowly enough for you to catch every word.

Do not go in large parties "personally" conducted. It is easier for two to make the trip than one, and you can in most instances economize by having three in the party. Do not go in one of the large fashionable vessels, but choose a small vessel carrying only second and third class passengers. They take a little more time, but as there is generally a literary class of people on board, the trip is made very agreeable. And as a rule the salt air is very beneficial.

COMFORT has had in mind when offering this superficial information, the great body of teachers, preachers, and the cultured classes of small means, who have thought they would like to go to the Exposition, but who have not as yet crystallized any plans.

To see Paris is a privilege, for there is a prodigality of beautiful things, and the historical associations give material for a lifetime of study. And no one can know what patriotic feelings are aroused or how deep the love of one's own country is, until he has crossed the Atlantic; comparing the life of the great mass of the people with the every-day life of an American citizen makes one know how sweet it is to live under the flag that stands for Liberty. And every day you thank God for being an American and every day you pray for the privilege of returning to the greatest country in the world—the United States of America.

The United States National Pavilion at the Paris Exposition is 100 feet high, the style of the exterior is classic and is a marked contrast to the French buildings, which are not so architectural in treatment. It is situated on Quay d' Orsay, one of the best locations on the grounds. The plan is square, with a large central dome and rotunda. There are rooms on three sides, opening out of the rotunda, one for ladies, one for gentlemen and one for both. On the second story is a room where people may rest and register, if they so desire, and the third story is given up for the offices of the commissioner-general and his staff. The fourth floor will be used as is the second.

There will be two electric American elevators, and in the centre arch of the portico will be a statue of Washington, while a bust of President McKinley will occupy a niche over the door.

$10,000 has been appropriated as a fund for the mural decorations and artistic treatment of the interior of the building, and it is the intention of the art commission to employ the best American artists upon this work, and to make it the finest example of decorative art which the United States has ever produced at any exposition.

HOW ONE CHURCH WAS BUILT.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE city of Chihuahua, Mexico, is noted for two things in particular, viz:—The wondrously rich Santa Eulalia Silver mine, and the magnificent church of San Francisco, more commonly known as the Chihuahua Cathedral.

The mine was discovered some three hundred years ago, in the early days of the Spanish occupation of the country, and although it has been worked continuously ever since, there is as yet no indication that its huge body of ore will ever be exhausted.

The building of the famous church began about a hundred years after the discovery of the Santa Eulalia, and the richness of the mine is testified to by the fact that the cost of the church, $800,000, was realized during the time occupied by its construction from a small tax placed upon the product of the mine.

"But even with such a mine behind the enterprise, how on earth did they manage to erect such a building without machinery for hoisting the ponderous stones?" you involuntarily ask, gazing upward at the massive stone walls of the church edifice.

If you are addressing a native of Chihuahua, he will tell you that he cannot say positively how it was done, that the building was completed a little before his time—along in 1789, just about the time the Constitution of the United States was adopted. But he will add that there is a legend to the effect that the stones were carried up to their places on the backs of burros (donkeys.)

"Burros!" you exclaim, incredulously. "Why burros cannot climb ladders, even without loads, and how else could they get up so high?" And you have displayed your ignorance of Mexican ingenuity.

"As the legend runs," your informant will go on to say, "the stones were brought from the quarry on the backs of burros, and lifted thence directly to their places in the building. But bye and bye the walls grew so high this could no longer be done, so earth was brought and banked about the walls, making a gentle incline up which the animals ascended to the desired height. And as the walls continued to grow, more earth was brought, the burros mounting higher day by day, until the last stone was in position and the church completed."

"But what became of the huge heap of earth that must then have surrounded the church?" you ask, gazing upward at the lofty towers.

"Quien sabe? (literally, who knows?)" your informant replies, with a shrug; "the legend does not say, but as it is not there now, I presume it was carried away."

RHEUMATISM IS DEAD!

Long Live OXIEN, the King of Remedies that Killed it.

No more infernal tortures, no more roastings of the flesh with red hot irons, no more lightning shocks from the electric battery or dosings with dangerous drugs.

RHEUMATISM HAS BEEN CONQUERED by Oxien the triumph of medicine, the Godsend of the age. Absolute cures are now certain, and Oxien is making them every day. In this connection

WE HAVE A WORD TO SAY.

Oxien was last year put to the test as a remedy for Rheumatism and it made a record of absolute cures in Acute Rheumatism, frequently called rheumatic fever, Pericarditis (inflammation of the investing membrane of the heart), Endocarditis (inflammation of the living membrane of the heart), subacute rheumatism, sometimes applied to the less severe attacks of the disease, chronic rheumatism, which swells and twists the joints and sciatica, or neuralgia of the sciatic nerve. In fact Oxien is guaranteed to cure Rheumatism in any form. Thousands jump for joy and many write as follows:

Received OXIEN O. K. Found it far superior to what you represent. Have tried everything I could hear of for rheumatism. For ten years I have been crippled up with this terrible disease. Laid in bed one whole year. Could not turn or feed myself and when I was able to walk on crutches (which I did for four years) was crooked and unable to straighten up, but Oxien did it and you can imagine how happy I am now. Yours sincerely, Geo. F. Lawton. Olympia, Wash., Feby. 9th, 1898.

FREE 200,000 BOXES OF RHEUMATISM CURE. FREE. This momentous offer we make in order to more thoroughly introduce this amazing rheumatism remedy in the United States and Canada. None but those who will give us their word that they either suffer from rheumatism, or are afraid of it through hereditary tendencies will be considered entitled to free treatment. Therefore, if you want a box free send at once, yes to-day. Write plainly as our clerks are badly rushed.

THE GIANT OXIE CO., Box 1120, Augusta, Maine.

CONDITIONS.

To have one's hands read in this department, by Digitus, one of the finest living palmists, it is necessary to observe the following conditions:

Impressions of both hands must be sent, fully postpaid and having the name, address and nom de plume of the sender enclosed in the package also.

The package must in every instance be accompanied by the names and addresses of eight new subscribers at twenty-five cents each, the whole amount, $2.00 being remitted, with the package, addressed to COMFORT PALMISTRY CLUB, Augusta, Maine.

No notice will be taken of impressions and requests for readings unless the sender has fully complied with the above conditions.

To take impressions, first hold two large pieces of blank paper over a candle or similar flame, until they are heavily coated with the smoke. Then lay these pieces down, smoke side uppermost on a pad of cotton. Now place the two hands, palms downward, one on each sheet of paper, pressing firmly and steadily down, but taking care not to move the hand. Keep them so for one minute and lift carefully, so as not to disturb the impression. Have ready some fixatif, which can be bought at a drug store or an art store or made with gum arabic and water in an atomizer. Spray this over the impressions before they are moved and allow them to dry. Then they are ready to send.

Smoked paper impressions are the best. But if it is desired to send a plaster cast, take plaster of Paris and dissolve in water to the consistency of thick cream. Pour this into a large shallow dish and when it is hardening place the hand, well-greased, palm downward, in the plaster, pressing downward. Several minutes will be required to get this impression and great care must be taken in removing the hand, not to break the plaster. Casts are exceedingly difficult to send without breaking and should be very carefully packed in a box with the name of the sender written on it. Putty is sometimes successfully used in place of plaster. A good photograph if sufficiently well taken to bring out all the lines, can also be read, although in all cases the smoked paper is the best, if properly treated with fixatif.

Bear in Mind that all the above conditions must be observed.

Also, that letters not complying with them will go into the waste-basket. Readings cannot appear for several months after impressions are sent.

I AM gratified to see how great an interest is taken in this department, and am always glad to receive letters from the readers of this corner, although it is not possible to give personal answers to them all. Answers to questions about palmistry, however, will always be given in this department when desired, so that students of this science need not hesitate to send them in. There are several questions this month. Remember that in asking questions that can be answered here, you are helping other students as well, for the answers are of interest to all who take an interest in the subject. One reader of COMFORT says:

"I send a question regarding the marriage line this month, and if the answer is as helpful and inspiring to others as many of the questions and answers have been to me, I shall be very glad." And she adds: "It is all interesting but the questions and answers, are in my estimation, the best for learners."

It is "Effie" who asks, and she wants to know if the marriage line coming to or on the life line must always come from the inside? Opinions differ about this, I notice among leading palmists; the balance, however, seem to have decided that the marriage line must come from the inside or the side of the life line towards the thumb. It should be about one sixteenth of an inch from the life line and should not branch off. If it does shoot off away from the life line after a little that shows that there will be an estrangement between the parties at the age indicated on the life line. The marriage line may be long or short, the length indicating the term of years the marriage lasts. It should not cut the life line; if it does it denotes disappointment. The same rules apply to the marriage line following the fate line. The line indicating marriage under the little finger is the first marriage line, but this does not always count unless it is seconded by one either on the life or the fate line. When the marriage line under the little finger droops at the inner end towards the heart line it is a sign that the subject will live longer than his or her partner. If it is much broken up the subject will not be liable to marry; if he does the marriage will be unhappy. If the marriage line runs down on the mount of Mercury, crossing the heart and fate lines and striking over to the mount of Venus, it means divorce; if there is an island on this line, disgrace or scandal. The marriage line ending in a cross means unhappiness.

GENUINE.

"Aggere" has probably noticed that her hands were read in the August number. I have repeatedly stated that it is necessarily several months after the hands are received here that readings appear.

It is useless for young men to write to me requesting addresses of the young ladies whose hands appear in COMFORT. This is not a matrimonial bureau.

Another club member writes to say that he has discovered a good way to "fix" impressions of hands. He pours a little alcohol into a flat dish (like a jelly tin for instance), and draws the paper impression rapidly through it, drains carefully and hangs it up to dry. The alcohol can be saved for another time.

"Genuine" sends a very good impression of her hands, which indicate a person of great refinement and sensitiveness. She is practical and sensible and will always receive a good deal of attention from the opposite sex. She has several love affairs and will be engaged twice before she is married. She will always receive a good deal of opposition from her people against the men she goes with, and she will marry without their full approval. She will be left a widow before she is forty-five. She has a long life before her and on the whole, it will be a successful one, though she has some troubles of a domestic nature. She will be preserved from their most evil effects, however, and her circumstances will improve steadily as long as she lives. She will be well off in old age. Her life will be far more peaceful after she has passed middle life. She has a great deal of talent and might excel as a musician or an artist, although she lacks somewhat in perseverance or rather the ability for close application to business which is necessary to success in anything. She will travel a good deal in the latter part of her life and die in this country at a ripe old age. She will live to be ninety or a hundred. If she will overcome her tendency to over sensitiveness she will live a happy life and a useful one.

"W. H. S. Jr." has a very lucky hand also. The impressions he sends denote a clear business head and shrewdness; strong common sense, a good disposition and a long, fortunate life. He is capable of carrying on several kinds of business at once and will make a success of them all. He has that peculiar turn of mind that can oversee several things at a time and not err in judgment. He will make an excellent husband, but marriage is far from being the principal interest in life to him, and he is not over fond of the opposite sex; I mean so that he will be foolish or make mistakes on account of it. He will be thought a good deal of in the town where he lives and will hold many public offices. He will enter the political field by and by and will rise as high as he cares to. In fact a hand like this indicates that its owner can do pretty much anything he undertakes to. He will live to be very old, without much sickness. There will be but one serious affair of the heart, though in this matter as in other things he can do pretty much as he pleases, as he will be much respected and sought after, especially in middle life, by women. There is no bad luck apparent, and "W. H. S. Jr." has every reason to be congratulated.

W. H. S. JR.

"Lygia" sends impressions that are badly spotted, but I will do the best I can with them. She has a highly nervous temperament as indicated by the multiplicity of fine lines in the hand. She would also have an irritable disposition, but I think has it under control, as she has a good deal of native strength of character. There are many trials in her early life, many of which come from the opposition of friends to her desires and ambitions. She will have a good deal of poor health, but has a strong constitution to bear it; and she will live to be an old woman if she passes safely a long period of ill health from fifty to sixty or thereabouts. She has a reverent, religious temperament and has a great deal of native ability as a speaker or writer, which she would do well with if it is properly cultivated and trained. The marriage lines are blotted in both hands, but I judge that she will marry rather young and will lead a happy life, if she does not allow a tendency to jealousy to get the upper hands of her. She will be moderately successful in what she undertakes, and would do well as a business woman or as a teacher. She will be popular with the opposite sex and have many friends. This hand, I imagine, belongs to a young person; I ask her friends to wait until she is thirty or so before passing judgment either on this reading or on her; as she will change and develop much before she arrives at that age.

Once more it becomes necessary to call attention to the rules and conditions for reading of hands. I am in receipt of the following letter:

"I send my hand. I also send five cents to pay for the paper one month. I expect to see the reading of my hand in print. Let me have it either in the July or August number. (The letter was dated July 17.) I shall be very much disappointed if I do not see it."

Now, it ought not to be necessary to repeat every month that such letters go into the waste basket; but they do. The rules for hand-reading are plainly printed at the head of this department. No impressions that do not comply in every item with the conditions will appear in this paper. Cut out the rules and keep them.

Stories About the Lynx.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE French settlers in Canada early encountered a wild animal about as large as a setter dog, except that the body is thicker from side to side, and the tail only four or five inches long, seeming little more than a tuft of hair. Though the creature stands no higher than an average setter, his legs are longer, but very crooked at the joints, and also very much larger. His head is rounded like a cat's, but is more flattened; and his muzzle is a little longer, but similarly whiskered. His short ears stand straight up their apparent height being increased by a tuft of long stiff hairs—which, I suppose, protects them from the severe cold of the regions which the beast inhabits. He has coarse, thick fur, with much long hair, but which is not quite sufficient for shagginess. The color is a brownish gray, with darker cloudings.

This animal is the Canada lynx, called by the French Canadians loup cervier (lucivea) because it was found to destroy deer and caribou. It does this by dropping on their backs from some large, low branch under which the prey passes. Its long, sharp, curving claws enable the lynx to maintain its hold on its victim while it bites its long tearing teeth deep into the poor creature's throat.

The beasts of prey which the French peasant knew in his native country were the bear and wolf (loup); and as this new world animal, like the wolf, killed deer (cervier), it was given the name of loup cervier or deer-wolf.

The usual prey of the lynx is the grouse and smaller animals, especially the hare, or rabbit. In pioneer settlements they were less destructive to the flocks than wolves only because they are less bold, from their habit of hunting singly.

One April a few years ago, in approaching Bangor in the middle of the State of Maine, from the Kennebec region, by steam car, I observed a flock of sheep feeding on the sweet, freshly springing grass on a hillside. They were scattered in large and small groups, and among them were many lambs. As the train ran angularly toward one end of the hill, I saw a large loup cervier spring out of a clump of bushes a little distance from the train and run in long leaps over the further end of the slope toward the woods. He had been waiting there to spring upon a lamb when any should wander near enough; but the roar of the train and the tremor it caused in the ground, had given the beast a great fright.

As the train passed on I saw, near the other side of the hill, in the yard of a house, a large dog. The nearness of this guardian of the farm accounted for the caution of the lynx in attacking the flock. The Canada lynx, though there are few dogs it could not overcome, is not apt to attack them unless cornered or hungry or in defense of its young.

While calling at a farmhouse in a sparsely settled district in the central part of Maine a few winters ago, a fat old dog of medium size nosed about me in a friendly manner. Nodding at him, the farmer remarked "Old Bruce had a tussle with a lucivea the other night right here by the house."

Several of the family, it was then related, heard the dog bark violently, and as though in a great fright,—very different from his usual defiant, threatening utterance. There was a shifting in the location of the sound, as though the dog was retreating, not toward the partially open woodshed where his bed was, but towards the high doorsteps of the porch. Then there was a fierce scream or yowl, much like that of a cat, but surely from a creature many times larger. Then was heard a violent scratching of the house door, evidently by the dog, which was at the same time yelping and howling. Next the voices of both animals were mingled in a wild tumult of fierce snarls and growls, followed by the more defiant barking of the dog, which seemed to be slowly moving toward the road. Then came another snarling yowl from further away.

All this occurred within three minutes; so that when the boys were sufficiently awakened to get up and look out of the window there was nothing to be seen but the dog, coming in from the road, often halting and looking back, growling angrily.

In the morning there was found, a little way along the road, an uncommon kind of track leading into the woods. The prints in the snow were as wide as a man's fist would make, and much longer. There was no doubt as to what beast made them. The hinder feet of the lynx have but four claws, while the fore-feet have five.

Being of such size, and such a distance apart, especially when the animal moves by leaps, the farmer boys, when these tracks are reported in the neighborhood, are very good about coming home before dark.

At another farmhouse where I spent several hours one day in the spring, I learned that the dozen-year-old boy had, a few days before, come home in great breathlessness and excitement from a pasture where he had been sent to make some slight repairs in a fence beside the woods.

By his account, his little dog was nosing about for squirrels in the woods near by, when a fierce, snarling cat-like yell was heard; and the dog came out of the woods as fast as he could run, with his tail curled down between his legs. Only the volume of sound in the strange cry was much greater than could have been made by the largest domestic cat ever known; and, hearing a slight sound of dry twigs crackling, the boy followed his dog as fast as his legs would carry him.

It has been said that the lynx is generally shy of buildings, but I remember hearing of some trout fishermen who had lost their way and being overtaken by a shower, and who found shelter in a ruinous old barn far away from any dwelling, where they had refreshing repose on the scattered hay, until near morning when they were awakened by stealthy footsteps about them. As they rose all together, there were three of them, the animal ran up a post and mounted a large beam. On this he extended himself closely with his paws partly on the sides; where he looked down upon them with glaring eyes.

The fishermen were without gun or pistol, but had large pocket knives, and they soon provided themselves with clubs. It was not yet daylight and so early that they preferred another nap to turning out in the wet; so they gathered a few stones and knots by feeling about along the barn sills, which they flung at the beast in a continuous volley that brought from him a series of snarls and yells and meows, until he finally jumped down from his perch and fled from the building.

I knew an old farmer who, when he was a young man, went to his barn early one winter morning to feed the cattle. At the moment of entering he caught a glimpse of a bob-cat (bay-lynx) as it ran to a large hen-hole in the same side of the barn, which had been inadvertently left open. The farmer instantly sprang forward and seized the intruder by the hind legs, trying to break the beast's back while it was wedged in the hole. But the back was too tough and the big cat was drawn in, which placed his captor in a very difficult position. Yet, unwilling and not daring to let the fierce marauder go, he whirled swiftly round and round, beating the beast's head against posts and cart wheels until his struggles ceased. Then he dropped a dead bob-cat on the floor and sat down himself, exhausted and dizzy, and tried to count the scratches.

A few miles from the locality of the last catastrophe another farmer (widely known since he grew old as Uncle Nat) had a very unusual form of encounter with a bay-lynx. While walking through the woods his attention was attracted by a wonderfully large nest in a thick topped, rough-barked tree of the kind called pumpkin-pine. It was probably a crow's which had been added to in each of many years of use. He climbed up and found the nest contained four very young bob-cats. As he took up one it uttered a loud, snarling, mewing cry, which was instantly answered from the woods. In a few seconds the parent appeared coming towards the tree in long leaps striking—Uncle Nat asserted—twenty feet up the trunk.

Uncle Nat always admits that he was frightened. There he was at least forty feet above the ground, and maintaining his position with difficulty. It was death to let go, and worse to hold on, for he had no kind of weapon, not even a knife, and was but thinly clothed. Almost instinctively he seized one of the little bob-cats and threw it out among the branches. As it went shrieking down the old lynx turned and ran down the tree, hunted up the half-stunned young one and carried it away out of sight. This took but a few moments when she was back, running up the tree again. All the prisoner could do was to fling out another of the little lynxes, and the cat went down the tree again. The process was repeated the third time, also.

Uncle Nat had now learned the proper tactics for fighting a bob-cat, and when she was on the tree again he flung the fourth and last of the young ones as far away as he possibly could. When the lynx went down the tree he followed her at a speed that knocked fragments of bark from the tree and from his own body, and tore big holes in his garments. The instant he reached the ground he struck out for home through the bushy woods at the liveliest gait he ever made.

There was a state bounty for killing lynx at the time, but Uncle Nat never went back to count up the dead ones in the vicinity of that old pumpkin-pine.

ALL the inhabitants of Sonneberg, which is in the interior of Germany, make dolls for a living. Twenty-five millions of dozens of dolls are produced every year by these people, of whom there are twelve thousand in the business. It takes eighty persons to make one doll. The labor is divided as much as possible and each worker makes one thing only. Children are employed in painting the nails on the dolls' fingers, also in stuffing the bodies with sawdust, hay or chopped straw. The wigs are made in Munich and the eyes come from a small town just outside Sonneberg. The most expert of the men paint the cheeks, eyebrows and lashes of the dolls. In exporting, many things have to be taken into consideration; for instance, a doll with rubber joints cannot be sent on a sea voyage, for on her arrival she would be armless and legless. Wax dolls are not sent to very hot or very cold countries, as in the former they would melt and in the latter they would crack.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE receipt of a postal card from E. A. Sayer of Deatsville, Ky., requesting information regarding the lattice-work jacket which was illustrated in this department not long ago, makes it necessary for us to state that we cannot go into the full particulars in these columns; we can tell her that it takes two pieces of the narrowest black velvet for the front and back of jacket, and sleeves; that the velvet is put on about two inches apart. If people want detailed information about articles which we have already described minutely, as well as illustrated, they should at least enclose postage for a reply to their inquiry, for we cannot take the space twice for the same article, in these columns. We endeavor to so explain articles that it will be perfectly clear to any one with an average amount of brains just how they are made—but if we fail to do so, we gladly give further information if postage is sent for that purpose, by writing further particulars.

I attended a wedding anniversary, a short time ago, at which there were about twenty-five people. Now this number is a hard one to entertain, for there are too many for cards, and the evening seems long when there is absolutely nothing to do but talk. So the hostess arranged beforehand some large sheets of heavy brown paper, upon which were pasted pictures of noted people, with numbers under each picture. There were 63 in all, and the guests were given sheets of paper and pencils and were then turned loose among these pictures—the object being to write down on the paper, with the number, the names of as many of the pictured people as possible, the one having the largest number right to receive a prize. I was fortunate enough to receive first prize, having guessed correctly 56 out of a possible 63. I had a number of other names right but had the numbers attached to those names wrong, so of course those names did not count. Now there are quantities of people whose pictures we have seen, in newspapers, books, shop windows, and yet when one sees such a lot of faces to be guessed upon, one's brain seems to work backward, or refuses altogether to work, and one is continually getting the wrong name for faces. But if plenty of time is taken and one goes the round of the rooms in which the pictures are hung several times, each time leaving unanswered those numbers of which one is not perfectly sure, it will be found that as one gets accustomed to it accurate guesses may be made in almost all cases. The great difficulty is when the pictures are poor prints, and sometimes it happens that one knows that two pictures are respectively Cotton Mather and Oliver Cromwell, and yet the pictures are so poor that it is a toss up as to which is which. No one could possibly fail to name all of the portraits given in our illustration, as our artist has been very faithful in his reproduction; but a hostess isn't always so considerate, when arranging a set of pictures, for the very reason that it is the more puzzling and interesting if people have to keep guessing, only to finally guess wrong.

Of course the guessers do not consult together—that is, they are supposed not to—though it is almost impossible not to occasionally hear some one name pictures as they recognize them. When all have taken all the time they care for, the hostess reads from a list the numbers and the names of all the pictures, and each guesser marks on his own list in such a way that he can count up, when the reading is finished, the number of correct guesses he has made, whereupon the one who has made the largest number of correct guesses walks off with the cake, or whatever the prize may chance to be. It is good fun to have booby prizes, also, for the least number of correct guesses. There is usually a first and booby prize for ladies and gentlemen.

One of the trials of the mother who goes visiting with a small baby is the care of the diapers. I recently saw a case for these which was so simple to make, and which answered the purpose so admirably, that I want to describe it for the benefit of such mothers.

The case was made from dark gray linen, and required a piece sixteen inches wide and about one and one-half yards in length. Cut one piece one yard long; nine inches from one end fold the edges so that they shall slant to a point, and cut off the corners thus folded over. Turn a hem two inches deep on the opposite end, so that it shall come upon the front when folded up like a pocket, and catch the hem in place with a row of rather coarse feather stitching done in red Asiatic floss. Lay a piece of white rubber cloth, sixteen inches wide and twenty-five inches long upon the linen, rubber side out, and baste a strip of red dress braid along the two ends. Catch this through rubber and linen with featherstitch also of the red floss. Now turn up the end of the linen and rubber to just below where the upper end has been slanted toward the point; that is to the upper edge of the rubber. This will form a pocket, and the whole piece will be in much the form of an envelope. Now add another piece of linen over this pocket to form a second. First turn the hem on one end as directed before, finishing with feather stitching in the red Asiatic floss. Baste the different parts together and then bind all around the edge with the red braid. This will hold the pockets together at their sides, and will give a nice finish. As it now stands the case has two pockets the full width of the linen, the inner one of rubber and the outer one of linen. The inner pocket is of course for wet diapers that have to be carried, and the outer one for dry diapers.

The case will be made more attractive and given a nicer finish if a large initial is worked in the point of the flap, using for this either the Asiatic filo or the Roman floss in red, to match the binding and featherstitching. To keep the case closed, take three-fourths of a yard of red ribbon, divide it, and sew half on the point and the other half where the point touches the front of the case. This is to be tied into a bow, and altogether the case is a very nice looking as well as serviceable affair.

Baby's underclothes should be of the softest wool, and loose enough for comfort. Use woven wool shirts instead of linen ones. Let his cradle covers be the lightest, downiest ones you can make or buy. In cold weather the little feet should be looked after. Holding them to the fire until they are thoroughly warmed will often cure a spell of crossness and crying. Provide warm woolen socks for them, and if that is not enough wrap them in flannel. Cold feet, exposure to sudden changes of temperature or draughts of cold air, are almost sure to result in an attack of colic. Keep the room in which he stays as nearly 70 degrees Fahrenheit all the time as possible. If the baby wakens fretful and out of sorts, it is either unwell, or hasn't had its nap out. There is one thing that few people seem to realize, and that is arranging the child's clothes with a view to ease, and giving it plenty of room.

The perfect shoe has not yet been evolved for infants. The ideal shoe should conform as nearly as possible to the shape of the foot, and be neither too loose nor too tight. In particular, it should be amply wide across the great-toe joint, and allow the toes room to spread out, instead of being pressed together. Mothers should see that the baby's shoe is correct in this respect, and that it is also long enough to extend slightly beyond the toes in order to allow freedom of motion and room for growth.

Having secured these essential points she can probably do little more toward attaining the perfect shoe until the shoemaker has reformed his views regarding the shape of a baby's foot. The sole of a baby's bare foot is not unlike a wedge in shape, the broad part being at the toes, while the shoe meant for his use is too often either narrower at the toes than at the heel, or else of about equal width.

We illustrate a little receptacle for needles, thread, scissors and thimble, also boot buttons and safety pins, to be used when traveling. It is made in the shape of the linen bags so often used in the place of a leather hand bag, and is made of brown linen, about six inches in length. Three pieces of the linen are necessary to make one, one about six inches square, and rounded on one side—and two round pieces for the ends. All these pieces are bound with braid and then sewn together and embroidered, if desired. A strip of linen is made and embroidered for the handle, and when completed it is filled with a paper of needles, some black silk, black linen thread, white thread, a card of boot buttons, some safety pins and an aluminum thimble; a pair of scissors is a sensible thing to add, if space allows. The end which laps over should have a small buttonhole in it, and a small pearl button should be sewn on where it will do the most good. Such a little receptacle should always be kept filled and ready to be dropped into the hand bag when one is to start on a journey; it is equally good for men, as for women, for accidents happen to men, and they all know how to thread and handle needles and threads—though few of them ever resort to the use of a thimble.

FELLOW-TRAVELERS.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

A GENTLEMAN and little girl were walking slowly down the path leading from Chattahoochee to River Junction. On all sides was a lavish display of tropical foliage and bloom, and the little girl's attention seemed divided between running from one point to another and listening to the mocking birds singing along the path.

"I say papa! everything is so beautiful," she said, as she paused beside a large clump of mountain azaleas.

The gentleman smiled and looked at her fondly.

"I hope my little girl will always see beauty in everything," he said.

Suddenly, as they turned a bend in the path, a quaint, boyish figure presented itself. He was possibly twelve or fourteen years of age, and walked with the slow, slouching gait of one weary with long travel. A crooked stick over one shoulder held a small bundle, and the sallow, freckled face was half concealed by the broad, flapping brim of a felt hat. A rope around the waist held his trousers in place, while a flannel shirt and pair of heavy, oversize boots completed his outfit.

He was about to pass by without looking up when the voice of the gentleman caused him to pause.

"Do you live in the neighborhood?"

"No," then after a moment's hesitation, "I'm jes' travelin'."

Something in the weary, hopeless tone caused the gentleman to look at him more closely. Then he said, genially:

"Good! we are fellow-travelers, then. Suppose we sit down for a few moments, if you are not in a hurry. Gertie and I are like you—just traveling. We stop and start whenever we feel the inclination, and we are fond of making new acquaintances, especially on such a morning as this. Suppose we open the lunch basket, little girl. I confess my thoughts have a tendency that way."

He spoke easily and led the way toward a large, flat rock, and the boy, after a brief hesitation, slowly followed. But his face was flushed, and he looked doubtfully from the gentleman to the little girl. What did it mean?

But as neither appeared to notice his confusion, it gradually subsided, and he soon found himself enjoying the novel situation. He had not realized he was so hungry, and the chicken and sandwiches were good. It had been a long time since he had tasted chicken or anything like the contents of this wonderful basket.

"Are you traveling far?" the gentleman asked at length.

"I dunno," then, more confidently, "maw she died las' week, an' Aun' Betty she 'lowed I warn't no good nohow, an' I'd better go befo' I done eat her outen house an' home. I left ter once. I 'low hit ain't ther Bender way ter live on nobody," lifting his head proudly.

"So your name is Bender, I take it?" said the gentleman, passing him another sandwich.

"Max Bender—like my paw an' gran'paw afore me," replied the boy, the sparkle not yet out of his eyes. "Hit war a good fambly befo' de wa', my maw has tole me. But de sheriff an' de tax man war a-hungerin' arter de lan', an' our folks hed ter move inter de mountain. I war borned thar an' never seed de ole place. My maw she 'lowed we war a-goin' back sometime, but hit 'pears now like she war mistak'n."

He had spoken slowly, almost listlessly, but toward the end there was a pathetic break in the tired voice.

While he was speaking the little girl had been edging slowly toward him, and she now placed her hand softly on his arm.

"My mamma is dead, too," she said, in a low voice, "and papa and I are traveling round and trying to—to—not mind it."

The boy looked up with a sudden moisture in his eyes.

"An' you an' him thought the worl' on her?" he asked, slowly.

She nodded, but made no reply.

"We can sympathize with you, my boy," said the gentleman, coming to her rescue. "It is a grief we cannot understand, but the reason will be made plain after awhile. I suppose you are traveling to your people now?" he continued, after a slight pause.

"Thar was only me an' maw," the boy replied, his head once more falling upon his hands. "Aun' Betty war only a law aun'. She war taken wi' shakes an' maw comed all ther way from C'lina ter nuss her."

"And have you no relatives in Carolina?"

"Naw. We w'uked roun' pickin' cotton an' totin' things. I 'lowed I'd fin' my way ter de old Bender plantation an' git w'uk."

"But you cannot walk all that distance."

"I lotted on gittin' a job on ther boat ter Eufauly an' walkin' from thar."

Then rising to his feet and picking up his bundle, he added:

"Hit ar time I war a-movin'. Happen ther boat comes along I mus' be on han'. I gin you alls thanks for ther vittles, an' 'lows you'll 'member me kin'ly."

Then with an odd little bow he was about to turn away when the gentleman slipped something into his hand. For a moment he looked puzzled. Then as the meaning of the act dawned upon him he threw the note away as though it burned his fingers.

"I war a 'lowin'," he said, in slow, scornful tones, "thet ther vittles an' ther talk war jes' a kin'ness atween travelers. Hit didn't come ter me thet I was a beggar. Ther Benders never t'uk ter beggin', an' I 'low hit ain't fur me ter be ther fust."

"I beg your pardon," said the gentleman, impulsively extending his hand. "It was a mistake. I——"

But at this moment the boy dropped his bundle and made a quick spring toward where the little girl was standing, near a heap of stones. At the same moment an ominous rattle was heard.

Before the gentleman rightly understood what was the matter, the boy's energetic stamping had ceased and he was once more moving toward the bundle. Then the full meaning of the scene burst upon him. Scarce a yard from where the little girl was standing a hideous reptile lay crushed and helpless.

"Thank God!" he exclaimed, huskily, as he caught her up in his arms. "Thank God—and you, my brave lad."

"Hit war nothin'," returned the boy, coolly. "I hev stomped heaps on 'em in C'lina. You jes' hatter be quick, thet's all. Though I 'low," he added, after a moment's reflection, "but would a been bad fer ther little gal if I hadn't a stomped 'im."

"You saved her life," returned the gentleman, "and have placed me under an obligation I can never hope to repay. But you must let me do what I can for you."

"I only takes pay fer w'uk," said the boy. "Ther stompin' kin go fer ther dinner."

"Well, then, will you work for me? I have a large number of men at work on my place and give good wages. You would also have time to attend school."

The boy leaned on his stick meditatively.

"I 'low I'd like ter w'uk fer you uns," he said, at length. "As fer ther school, we uns never lotted much on sech. I 'low I'd better stick ter ther w'uk."

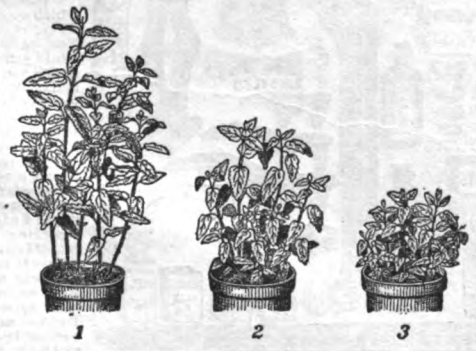
"But suppose that is the kind of work I want you to do—study books? Perhaps I may want you to assist my clerks, or to look after the work on the farm. Every man should know something of books and figures."

The boy looked doubtful.

"If you put hit thet a-way," he said, slowly, "I mont try, an' maw she ust ter say I war a powerful han' at tryin' when I set out."

FREAKS OF PLANTS.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.



THE production of artificial Arctic plants is one of the most curious of recent scientific experiments, and it is to a Frenchman—Prof. Bonnier, of the Sorboune University at Paris—that credit must be given for the notable discovery achieved in this direction. Everybody knows, of course, that plants which grow in the Arctic, or near the tops of high mountains, have peculiar characteristics; they are stunted and dwarfish, and the few flowers they bear are apt to be unusually large. Until now the reasons for these special features of growth have been a mystery, but the secret back of them is at last revealed.

Prof. Bonnier chose for his experiments plants of various kinds, such as white clover, oats and barley. His method was to take three young plants of the same species, and of exactly the same size, and put them into pots. The first he would grow under ordinary circumstances; the second he grew in a greenhouse which had walls packed with ice, and the third he put out of doors in the daytime and in the arctic greenhouse at night. As a result, it was found that the plant in the cold greenhouse developed only about one-half as rapidly as the one subjected to every-day conditions, while the one kept out in the day and in the iced house between suns attained only about one-quarter the growth.

Now, here was an entirely new discovery; for hitherto it had been supposed that the dwarfing of Arctic or high mountain plants was due to cold, purely and simply. But henceforth it will be realized that the plants of frigid regions, whether the cold is attributable to high latitude or high elevation, owe their stunted character to great daily alternations of temperature. On a mountain-top the sun is quite hot by day, but, of course, when its rays are withdrawn, the chill becomes intense, and this is why the characteristic Alpine plant develops slowly, being subjected in its growth to a series of checks, as one might say. It has no opportunity to produce many flowers, but those which it does put forth are made large, so as to give the best chance for attracting insects to fertilize them.

Arctic and high-mountain plants seem to be about the same in character and structure. Many vegetable species, practically identical, are found in Alaska and on Pike's Peak. When the great glacial ice-sheet, 100,000 years or so ago, was withdrawn from the northern half of the United States, numerous kinds of Arctic plants were left stranded, as it were, upon the loftier mountain-tops, and there they flourish today, doubtless unaware that this is a warmer country than it was in the epoch of their remote progenitors. In like manner, on various European mountain-tops, certain species of animals distinctively Arctic in character remain at the present time. Some Arctic plants, by the way, have actually a fashion of coming up through the snow and putting forth their flowers under such extraordinary conditions.

FIG. 2, CONSTANT LOW TEMPERATURE.
FIG. 3, DAILY VARIATION.

It is in France also that some very interesting experiments have been made recently with what are called "tree violets"— that is to say, violet plants transformed into the shape of little trees. The very notion seems an absurdity, inasmuch as violets are so essentially vine-like and earth-clinging; but from this habit they are weaned by the simple process of taking their runners and training them up on vertical sticks. Violets reproduce themselves in much the same fashion as strawberries, by sending out runners along the ground, and it is found that, by conducting these runners upward on sticks, the resulting plants are forced to take on a curious tree-like appearance. They bear flowers, too, under such conditions but only small ones, and the efforts of the French cultivators in the line are directed at present to enlarging the blossoms of these "violettes en arbre," as they call them.

Recently there have been exhibited in this country a number of dwarf trees, representing full grown oaks, elms, and a variety of other species, reduced to pigmy stature by artifice. Thus one may have a noble, sky-searching pine a foot and a half high, though full-grown—converted into this diminutive shape by a process of systematic starvation. Started from a seed enclosed in a gourd, furnished with a minimum of poor soil, and crowded through all its life in every imaginable way, the tree, which under favoring circumstances would have become a forest monarch, is reduced to the condition of a mere copy in miniature of its normal self.

Some really wonderful things are done with cacti, in the way of creating plant freaks. It would seem somehow as if cacti were the reptiles of the vegetable kingdom, inasmuch as theirs is only a sluggish sort of half-life. There is no difficulty in making them submit to any sort of botanical "monkeying," and, by applying the grafting process, almost any species can be induced to grow upon another. In this manner all sorts of grotesque effects are produced, counterfeiting in a rude way the aspect of various animals, etc. To kill a cactus is almost out of the question, and so there is a large license in such work.

Recently it has been ascertained that tomatoes will grow very well on potato plants, and this is an experiment which any person may try for himself. The process is simply one of grafting, and, as a result, a plant may be observed in the act of bearing potatoes below ground and tomatoes above ground.

By getting the goods from different countries and buying in large lots, we have made up a case of great value at very small cost. The Life of A Girl of Fashion.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

IT is these newly rich, who are counted the ruling class, and are often supposed by the casual observer to truly represent New York fashionable life. It is certain too, that to a great extent they do, and that the glitter of their gold dazzles the eyes so thoroughly that they are seldom estimated at their real value.

The children of this class have the advantage of education, but they hold to the parental conviction that money is the chief good of life. Let us see how the day of the fashionable girl, the daughter of such a home, goes by. She has had her winter in Paris, is brilliantly handsome, and has carefully studied every method of gratifying her tastes and developing new facilities for spending money. She has found out that to be in her "set" involves the adoption of many habits which she privately regards as a bore, but which must be followed; and she follows them with a patience and energy worthy a better cause.

First of these is a cup of morning tea, brought by the trim maid before she is out of bed. She has wakened to a deliciously drowsy consciousness of her dainty bedroom, in pale rose and gold, with soft, white, fur rugs and piles of cushions here and there. Her bed is hung with silk and lace, and at the windows are curtains also of finest lace over pale pink satin. Maud, for we must give her a name, looks at her little lapis lazuli clock, and then toward the portiere of plush and satin, which is pushed back to admit Justine, the maid, in the proper uniform of black dress, broad white collar and cuffs, and white cap. She bears a tray holding a cup of egg-shell china; a tiny teapot puffing with its own exertions; a cream jug also of the tiniest, and a Sevres plate with the merest morsel of thin dry toast. Tea at this hour in the morning is most unpleasant, but my lady Maud would not admit this even to herself, since all her "set" drink it, and Justine, late maid to the Countess of Quelquepart, and later to the Honorable Edith Beauchamp, would consider her quite unfit to serve if she departed from any custom of the fashionable world.

Maud drinks the tea, and makes a wry face behind Justine's back, then throws her pretty arms above her head and waits for further action. The sleeves of the pale blue silk nightrobe edged with falls of real lace, slip back and show the delicate veins and wrists. Maud is one of the type that buys the wonderful silk garments in wash-silk which adorn the shop windows, to the admiration of the uncultivated and the derision of the lady who knows that only linen and cambric have any rightful place in a woman's wardrobe, and who frowns upon everything that is not capable of coming fresher and whiter from the laundry, a thing that silk can never do. But Maud revels in these costly tokens of wealth, and has an assortment of shades in palest blue and pink.

Justine has lifted another portiere and disclosed a bathroom with porcelain-lined tub, and when she has turned on the water and piled her mistress's pretty brown hair on top of her head, she takes from a chiffoniere a loose bag filled with bran, shaved soap, and a little orris powder. This is the bath-bag, and Maud is rubbed with this substitute for soap, sponge, and unguent. Another rub with cocoanut oil follows, the grooming being as thorough as that given to a favorite racehorse, and when the delicate tinted silken underwear has been put on, a white China silk dressing-gown is thrown over all and she sits down before her toilet table. A dozen letters have come up with the tea and toast, which Maud opens as Justine brushes out her long locks. They are dinner invitations, one for a horseback ride, two for the opera, several teas, and one from a school-mate. In the meantime the electric bell has been touched for the breakfast. Thus far nothing has been said, but now, as Justine brushes, she waxes voluble as she tells what the maids of Maud's three most intimate friends have said about their young ladies.

Breakfast is there as the last pin is set in the pretty hair. There are hothouse grapes, chocolate, a bird on its square of toast, and all served in silver and porcelain of the finest. Maud is not hungry, for the supper last evening was something beyond any of the season, but she trifles with it all, and as she pushes away the plate the manicure is announced. In days of old it was the peripatetic hair dresser who gave our great grandmothers all the gossip of the town. Today the manicure fills his place, and, as she pares and polishes, Maud listens to the assurance that none of her choicest friends have nails that compare with hers in their power of assimilating polish. Maud listens well pleased, and believes it all, unknowing that precisely the same assurance has been given each one in turn.

At last the hands are in order, perfumed and polished to the last possibility, and Justine laces the satin corset, throws over her mistress' head the pale green silk skirt, and brings the green plush morning gown, with its silver cord and tassels and narrow bands of fur, and Maud descends to her mother's room to discuss the various invitations. Her father has gone two hours ago, as is the way of fathers on Wall Street, and she talks over the ball last night and the prospective one for next week till the hour strikes at which she must dress for an "informal luncheon" at the house of one of her friends on Fifth Avenue. Justine has in the meantime laid out her walking-dress, a tailor-made London gown, with the appropriate gloves and hat. Now she brings the cup of beef tea which Maud must drink to support her through the ordeal of putting on her gown and then my lady trips down the broad stairway, and out to lunch with her friend.

The luncheon is eaten,—a meal as elaborate as a party supper thirty years ago. The little party have chatted like magpies, till the stately butler announces the waiting brougham, and Maud hurries away, sinking back on the soft cushions of her own carriage drawn by a pair of handsome bays, a Christmas gift from papa.

It is the dressmaker's turn to be visited—the dressmaker who makes her "plain little frocks" as Maud calls them, for all her ball and visiting costumes come from the other side. This over, and one or two visits made, the horses heads are turned toward home, and Maud, as she walks slowly up the stairs, pauses for a moment at her mother's room and remembers that she has not seen her father for two days. She must see him tonight, for she wants money for the dressmaker, and she has already shaped the form of her request for so much beyond her allowance. On a table in her room are two jars of violets, and a heavy cluster of roses, gifts from three young gentlemen. The names on the cards attached are satisfactory, and she smiles with only a glance for the flowers themselves, which have cost enough to provide food and shelter for a month to any working woman in New York.

Justine is in waiting and comes forward now to remove wraps. There are two hours before dinner for rest and sleep, and Maud murmurs, "I am tired to death, Justine. I have done a good day's work."

Serene in this consciousness, she receives the loose gown which Justine throws about her, and lies down in the softly shaded room. At six o'clock she is wakened and rises drowsily from the great lounge to go through the toilet for the evening. On the little pink bed lies the exquisite costume of silver and white, in which she proposes to utterly rout and demolish the three young candidates for her interest who are to dine here with other guests. Justine draws on the silk stockings with threads of silver running through them; the silver embroidered slippers, the white silk petticoat with its many lace-edged flounces, and last a wonderful confection of tulle. Then comes the bodice of cloth of silver; the gloves nearly a yard in length; the fan of white ostrich tips and as the solemn butler announces in measured tones, "Dinner is served," she glides into the drawing room, with a little kiss for the father, unseen for forty-eight hours, who looks at her in profound admiration.

It is an imposing dinner, like all the dinners in this house, which is under the rule of one of the sternest of butlers, familiar with all the late methods of being thoroughly uncomfortable. As it goes on, Justine is laying out the opera cloak, also in white and silver, and the Russian shoes to draw on over her slippers. Maud rushes up at last, and stands now as the shoes are fastened by Justine and the wrap clasped with its silver clasps. The carriage waits. She is whirled away by her escort to the opera, and, when that ends, to a little dance and supper at another Fifth Avenue home.

It is two o'clock when Maud again enters her pretty room, still flushed from dancing and the excitement of all the sweet things to which she has listened. Justine is ready for her, heavy-eyed and tired; the costume slips off, and another bath and rub leave her ready for the night's sleep. Ten minutes of hair-brushing, another cup of the beef tea which is the society girl's tipple, and Maud lies down to wake to the same round, varied only by an occasional drive in the Park, a horse-back ride, a reading, or a matinee.

This is one type of society girl and a fair representation of those whose chief interest is money and what it will do. She reads a little now and then, but there is no time till summer and not much then, since each season has its round of obligations. Her life is quite outside the other set of fashionable girls who have a different cult every season, follow English customs assiduously, go "slumming," are interested in charities, Browning Clubs, and a round of more or less useful occupations. These more sensible girls go in for athletics, perhaps, discuss a thousand questions and may even have taken time for college. Out of their lives will eventually come the best fruits of wealth, since each experiment is teaching them its real meanings, and making them better fitted to transmit the inheritance to their children.

The Higher Education of Dressmakers.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE CRY of our day is "Let there be light." Everywhere there is a demand for a higher and more complete education. We believe in thoroughness in the last decade of the 19th century. It is now well understood that every trade and every profession must have not only a special training, but a broad and deep training, resting on exact knowledge.

Men and women are taught, not only how to do things, but why they should be done in one way, rather than in another. It is not enough to teach the cook how to prepare various dishes. She must know the reason of various combinations, and not merely their results. She must study chemistry before she can understand how to cook properly.

There are certain trades whose teaching is thoroughly conservative and among the ranks of whose followers it is difficult to introduce any innovations or improvements. Dressmaking is one of these, and twenty years ago it would have seemed a desperate undertaking to attempt to introduce any reform among the excellent, but unthinking women who constitute the majority of the mantua-making guild. Fortunately for the world and especially for the feminine part of it, the control of this trade is passing away from the dressmakers themselves into the hands of a comparatively small body of intelligent and cultivated men and women.

In the great institutions for technical training, which are springing up in our large cities, dressmaking is taught to large classes as a regular branch of manual training. This is true of the Drexel Institute of Philadelphia, of the Pratt Institute of Brooklyn, of the Young Woman's Christian Association in New York and elsewhere. These great benevolent institutions are presided over, not by the interested heads of trades unions, who seek each to protect and advance the supposed welfare of his own branch of industry, but by a disinterested body of trustees from whom we may hope for all manner of intelligent reforms.

To these great colleges of manual training we may look for progress and improvement.

We have already an Institute for Artist Artisans. Let us hope that some day we may have an institute of artist dressmakers. In the meantime, it would be a comparatively easy matter to introduce such changes in the dressmaking department of the institutions already existing, as to afford to those wishing to learn the trade, the opportunities for a higher education. Worth in Paris, Liberty in London, and Mrs. Jenness Miller and others in this country are already pioneers in the field of artistic dressmaking, and the immense patronage commanded by these foreign artists proves that here, as elsewhere, trained intelligence and cultivated taste, are more of a pecuniary reward.

Let us ask a moment what the dressmakers' profession is or should be. Is it not to provide a shelter that shall be at once comfortable, con-

Where Our Food Plants First Grew.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THE ORIGIN of some of the common vegetables and cultivated plants seems to be shrouded in mystery, though many efforts have been made to find out where they came from originally; but the great majority of them have been successfully traced to their earliest homes, where at the present day they are apt to be found growing wild.

For example, the potato is said to have originated in Chili or Peru, and in that part of the world it was cultivated long before the discovery of America by Columbus. Maize, or Indian corn, had its first beginnings on the highlands of Central America, and at the time of Columbus' landing was distributed as a food plant and raised as a regular crop over most of the United States. The famous French scientist De Candolle, who has made a special study of the subject, believes that the preservation of maize was due probably to some lucky accident. It is not at all like any other existing vegetable species, and is provided with no adequate means for dispersing its seeds, the latter being enclosed in a wrapper and hard to detach from the ear. Very likely it was on the point of becoming extinct, when a wandering tribe of savages, perceiving its value, saved it from destruction by cultivating it.

The third great vegetable gift of the New World to the Old was tobacco, the cultivation of which on this continent was already quite ancient when Columbus came over. At that period smoking was universal all over North America, while the inhabitants of South America chewed the weed and took it in the form of snuff. Pipes in great numbers have been found in the tombs of the Aztecs in Mexico and in the mounds of the mound builders of the United States. There does not seem to be very much doubt of the fact that the "herb nicotians" originated in Ecuador, or thereabouts.

One of the most ancient of cultivated plants is the radish, which seems to have been raised in gardens from the earliest historic times, having been derived originally from western Asia. The historian Herodotus speaks of a kind of radish that was eaten by the builders of the pyramid of Cheops. The turnip originally belonged in central Europe. An American plant, it is believed, is the sweet potato, and the Jerusalem artichoke is supposed to be a native of this continent likewise, having had its start in Indiana.

The onion is a vegetable of great antiquity, being among the earliest of cultivated species. A kind of onion grown in Egypt 2000 years and more ago was considered so excellent that it received divine honors, being worshipped as a god. This was considered a great joke by the Romans of those days, who, as well as the Greeks were acquainted with several varieties of onions. It is likely that the plant first grew in Persia or Afghanistan. Garlic has been raised in China for thousands of years, and the ancient Egyptians made great use of it. No picture of it has ever been found on the monuments, but this may be because the plant was considered unclean by the priests.

The common cabbage is a native of Europe, and grew originally among the rocks by the sea shore. To this day it is found growing wild in such localities in Denmark, on the south coast of England, and on the north coast of the Mediterranean. In all probability it was cultivated very anciently, and previously to that time was gathered in the wild state. The garden-cress, so popular as a salad, was valued in early times for properties of its seeds. Apparently, it was a native of Persia, whence it spread into Europe, where doubtless it originated.

The lettuce of our gardens is a modification of a wild species which may have had its first start in Southern Europe or Northern Africa. This wild plant is now found growing in those parts of the world. Lettuce was cultivated by the ancient Greeks and Romans, especially for a salad.

Spinach was unknown to the Greeks and Romans, and was new to Europe as late as the sixteenth century. De Candolle believes that the cultivation of it began in Persia about 2500 years ago. The famous traveller brought back to Europe some seeds of it, which he found in the empire of the ancient Medes and Persians. So far as is known, spinach does not now exist in a wild state.

Tea must have originated in China, and today the plant is wild in the mountainous region which separates the plains of India from those of the Middle Kingdom. Its use in the latter country is extremely ancient, but probably more recent in Japan, where an interesting legend is related to account for its origin. This story is to the effect that a priest who came from India into China, in the year 519 A. D. having succumbed to sleep when he had wished to watch and pray, in a moment of anger cut off his two eyelids, which were changed into a shrub. The shrub was the first tea tree, whose leaves banish sleep.

Flax is one of the very old cultivated plants. The ancient Egyptians and Hebrews made use of linen stuffs; indeed, the plant itself may be seen figured in old Egyptian drawings, and the microscope proves that the bandages in which the mummies are swathed are of linen. The lake-dwellers of eastern Switzerland, at a time when they used only stone implements, cultivated and wove a kind of flax. In a tomb of ancient Chaldea, prior to the existence of Babylon, flax has been discovered, and its employment in that region is lost in the remotest antiquity. The sort of flax in use today was introduced into Europe by the Finns. It seems to have originated between the Persian Gulf and the Caspian Sea, where it is still found wild.

Cinnamon is the bark of a little tree belonging to the laurel tribe, which grows profusely in the forests of Ceylon, where it doubtless originated. Sugarcane is cultivated at the present day in all the warm regions of the globe, but it was first grown in southern Asia, whence it spread into Africa, and later into America. The clove came originally from the Moluccas. The hop plant seems to be a native of Europe and western Asia, and at the present time it grows wild in Europe from England to the Mediterranean.

Oranges, of which there are many varieties in China are counted by the Chinese among their wild fruits. Most of them are doubtless natives of China, where they have been cultivated from very early times. The lemon came from India. Concerning the grape-vine, there is every evidence of its great antiquity in Europe and in Asia also. Grape seeds have been found in pre-historic lake dwellings in Europe, and records of the cultivation of the grape and of the making of wine in Egypt go back five or six thousand years. The plant must have originated in western Asia or in the neighborhood of the Mediterranean. Today it grows wild in southern Europe and western Asia, and to the south of the Caucasus it flourishes with the luxuriance of a tropical creeper.

Our common strawberry is one of the most widely diffused of plants, partly owing to the small size of its seeds, which birds swallow and thus carry to great distances. Its origin is uncertain on this account. The Greeks and Romans did not cultivate the strawberry, and it was not introduced into gardens until the fifteenth century or later.

Apricots were originally native to China, where they grow wild, and they were not brought to Europe until about the beginning of the Christian era. Almonds came from somewhere about the Mediterranean probably. The peach has been attributed to Persia, but De Candolle to whom the writer is indebted for most of his information, is disposed to think it really came from China. The pear grows wild over the whole of temperate Europe and western Asia, to which regions it seems to be native. Apples are thought to have originated in central Europe; they were cultivated from pre-historic times. The quince grows wild in the woods in northern Persia, near the Caspian Sea, and the pomegranate is likewise a native of Persia.

The watermelon came from tropical Africa, where it is now found wild in great fields. Cucumbers are from India, where they have been cultivated for at least 3000 years. The ancient Greeks were familiar with them. Olives are derived from Syria, and figs from the region of the Mediterranean, while bananas are not American, as so commonly stated, but from southern Asia. The pineapple is an American plant long ago introduced by Europeans into Asia and Africa.

Another valuable plant of American origin is the cocoa, from which chocolate is derived. It was cultivated in Central America and Yucatan at the time of the discovery of America, the seeds being actually used as money, so highly were they valued. The Spaniards carried the cocoa from Mexico to the Philippine Islands in 1674.

The common garden pea is supposed to have originated in Europe or in the west of Asia, but it is not found wild anywhere. The kidney bean is an American plant, and its seeds have been discovered in very ancient Peruvian tombs. The ground nut or peanut is a native of Africa. Buckwheat comes from central Siberia. Wheat is from the region of the Euphrates, and its cultivation is prehistoric in the Old World. The most ancient Egyptian monuments show pictures of it, and the earliest lake dwellers, who were at least as old as the Trojan war, grew the plant. The Chinese are known to have cultivated it as far back as 2700 B. C.

Oats and rye belong in eastern Europe; rice comes from India; the nutmeg is from the Moluccas; the castor-oil plant is from Abyssinia; black pepper is from India, and the cocoanut originated probably in Polynesia or in the Malay archipelago. The pumpkin and squash are North American.

venient and beautiful for the human body? And in order to do this, is it not necessary to know something about that body and what its requirements, and its true proportions are?

The dressmaker of the future—and let us hope of the near future, will study anatomy as every artist studies it and she will not neglect physiology and hygiene.

The human body is the most wonderful creation of the Almighty. Is it not time for us to understand that we cannot improve upon this shape, this human form divine? The dressmaker of the old dispensation makes the woman fit the dress instead of making the dress fit the woman.

This was the old order of things in the world of education. The old method was to mould the child's mind; now we understand that this must not be done. They know that the young mind has its own laws of growth. They seek to minister to these but not to compress or control the action of Nature.

And the dressmaker of the Higher Education will not endeavor, as her predecessor has done, to create a new woman, whose marvelous and surprising shape is a caricature of Nature and Art alike. She will cherish the less ambitious design of ministering to the comfort and enhancing the beauty of woman as the Lord made her. She will study at least the elements of art. She will acquaint herself with the laws of beauty, of color and of contrast and will make a special study of the line of beauty under various aspects. A knowledge of art will give her a sense of propriety and fitness and will enable her to create garments that will be beautiful in themselves. While she will not ignore the prevailing fashion she will modify its excesses and will adopt the style of dress to the requirements of each individual customer, be the latter blonde or brunette, tall or short, stout or thin.

The objection may be urged against the higher education of dressmakers that it would increase the price of women's clothes. The answer to this objection is that the introduction of machinery constantly tends to cheapen all products, and also that under this new system we shall need fewer dresses and fewer alterations, and can therefore afford to pay more for our clothes in the first instance.

Wise women do not often allow a Worth dress or an exquisite French bonnet to be altered. They prefer to wear a gown or hat that is a little out of style but which bears the stamp of artistic beauty, rather than a garment remodelled by an inferior dressmaker. Now if all our clothes were made by "Artists in Dress" we should not think it necessary, or even desirable to have them altered constantly.

We should thus avoid the terrible half-yearly scramble to have our clothes adapted to the last fashion, for "a thing of beauty is a joy forever."

Air has been liquified and many interesting experiments performed with it. It forms a bluish liquid.

It is one of the very best watches for time ever offered to our readers at no matter what the price asked for it. We know, of course, there are watches that cost more money, because they are in gold or silver cases, but they will not keep any better time, simply because they cannot. CONDUCTED BY AUNT SARAH.

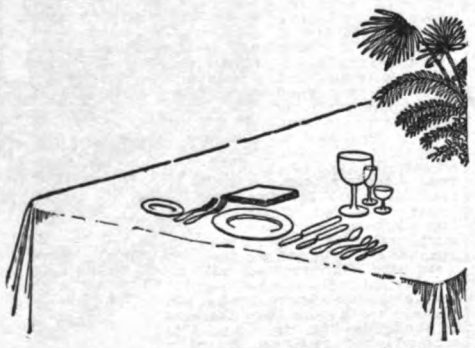
THE making of sandwiches has developed into a fine art, with the caterer, for at all five o'clock teas you will find them in all sorts of varieties and all sorts of shapes, and now comes a sandwich with a handle. This is a great boon to ladies who do not care to remove their gloves. The bread is cut in three-cornered slices and one corner is lengthened out so as to form a handle. After the sandwich is filled and put together, a strip of fringed florist's paper is neatly wound around this long end, and in this way the sandwich may be handled and eaten without in the least soiling the gloves or fingers.

Always use bread that is a day old, and that has been kept in a dry place, for sandwiches. A nice salad sandwich is made of brown bread onto which has been spread very thinly a dressing of pepper, salt, hard boiled egg yolks and lemon juice, with a little shredded water cress. Striped sandwiches are made by laying very thin slices of graham or brown bread alternately between thin slices of white bread, and spreading every other slice with cream cheese.

The best of meat sandwiches are no longer made with slices of the meat, but the meat is finely chopped and spread, with a nice dressing, over the slices; this makes them much easier to eat.

Gingerbread sandwiches are a novelty, and are made of thin slices of gingerbread spread with shreddings of the dark meat of fowl, with a little spice sprinkled over all. Another variety of sweet sandwich is one in which the filling is of chopped sweetmeats. These sweet sandwiches are crowding out the sweet cakes, formerly in evidence at afternoon teas.



A "Cover" is the name given to the paraphernalia which is necessary for each person for a full course dinner. Of course the number of utensils and glasses is determined by the number of courses to be served,—but the ordinary meaning of a "cover" is a plate—upon which is put the soup dish when served, and which is removed at the end of the soup course—forks at the left of the plate, together with a small bread and butter plate. At the right are arranged the knives of various sizes, soup spoon, teaspoon and butter spread, in the order named. The glasses are arranged in front, and a little to the right, and depend upon the number and kinds of wine to be served; of course the water glass is here. The napkin is placed near the plate. If the dinner is to be a long one, it is better to renew the silver when needed, rather than to lay the table with too many pieces at first.

A few hints may be of use just at this time, when all kinds of renovating, cleaning and general upheaving is on the tapis.

When putting down stair carpeting, put something under the edge, at least—that is, under the part of the carpet which comes across the edge of the stair. If you cannot afford the patent felt pads sold for this purpose, make some of old blankets or strips of old woolen gowns. Stair carpets will last twice as long if protected where they go over the edges.

Ink marks may be removed from books, if the stains are not of too long standing, by moistening them with a soft cloth dipped in the following mixture: Add to a teaspoon of chlorinated lime enough water to cover it. Apply to the stain, and make a second application if it is not removed by the first.

To keep flies off gilt frames of pictures, paint the frames with the water in which onions have been boiled. This doesn't injure the gilding and is a sure preventive against flies.

A COVER.

Do not keep groceries such as sugar, tea, etc. in the bags in which they come from the store, but have some wooden boxes with tightly fitting covers into which to put them as soon as they come. A great deal of strength is thus saved, to the articles, and also the contents are thus saved, as, if left in the bags for any length of time the bags get torn and so the contents are often spilled over the pantry shelves and have to be swept up and thrown away. Glass preserving jars are very good for keeping tea, coffee, rice, powdered sugar etc., for they are thus kept air-tight, and then there is the advantage of being able to tell at a glance, just what is in the bottles—while with boxes the covers have to be removed.

Scorched linen may be restored to its proper color by dampening it and laying it on the grass to bleach. This must be repeated several times.

A dish of charcoal standing in a larder will keep the articles sweet and wholesome almost as well as ice. It is a great disinfectant, but must be changed constantly. Fresh meat is preserved a long time by sprinkling it with powdered borax. When it is to be used, rinse in clear water.

Marble statuary may be cleaned with a solution of saleratus and boiling water. Use a quarter of a pound of saleratus to two quarts of water and boil two hours. Leave it on the marble twenty-four hours and then wash off. Stains may be removed from marble by a solution of equal parts of vitriol and lemon juice. Wet the spots and leave them for an hour, and then wipe with a soft cloth. To clean bronze, rub with sweet oil and polish with chamois.

A weak solution of salt and water is one of the best remedies for poor digestion, and for a cold in the head there is nothing better. Snuff up the nose. A handful of rock salt added to the bath acts as an invigorator, and a gargle is a good remedy for sore throat. Salt and water is excellent for the teeth as it is very cleansing and hardens the gums.

In case of burns or scald, apply common whiting and oil, or water if oil is not at hand. Make the ingredients into a paste and lay it over the burned parts, covering up with some old pieces of linen and cotton wadding.

For headache, sponge the head all over, night and morning, with water as hot as can be borne, and rub dry with a coarse towel.

To clean japanned trays, first wipe with a clean cloth wrung out of lukewarm water, to remove all dirt. Then sprinkle dry flour over and polish with a soft cloth.

To prevent the shrinkage of flannel, put new flannel into clean cold water and let it remain for a week, changing the water often. Then wash in warm water using a little soap.

An excellent liniment for bruises is equal parts of laudanum, alcohol and oil of wormwood.

A good recipe for those who are suffering from summer complaint is made as follows: Mix one teaspoonful ground cinnamon with one-fourth teaspoon saleratus and one teaspoon sugar. Pour on boiling water and let it remain until cool and then add one ounce of tincture rhubarb. The dose is one half to a full wineglass.

Another remedy is made from an ounce each of camphor, capsicum, tincture rhubarb, opium and peppermint. It is to be taken in milk and water, twenty drops for an adult and five for a child, the dose repeated every two hours until relieved.

AN instrument for massaging the eye has been invented by a Frenchman, which is said to be particularly valuable in cases of short sight. This instrument causes the hardening of the eye to disappear and gradually restore it to its normal tone. The pressure exercised by the apparatus brings the crystalline nearer to the retina and thus lessens the effect of refraction. Progressive short sight is not only stopped, but the eye is otherwise much improved by the use of the instrument.

THE curious way in which fishes eat is a study. Some have teeth and some have none; some draw in the food by suction; the sturgeon is one of this class. The jelly-fish wraps its body around its prey and absorbs its food. The crab chews up its food with its legs and claws before passing it into the mouth. The skate's mouth sets transversely across its head, the jaws working with a rolling motion like two hands set back to back. The carp masticates its food in its throat, where its teeth are set. The star-fish fastens itself upon its victim, turns its stomach wrong side out and engulfs its dinner.

"THE LIGHT THAT WON'T GO OUT."

Every family in America is ready to buy "The light that sells on sight"—the wonderful new invention called ARC-LIGHT WICK.

It burns a whole year without trimming. It kills a candle, discounts kerosene, beats gas, and almost equals electricity or sunlight.

It saves 20 per cent. of oil. It's clear, white and brilliant. It's the light that won't go out. It's the light in the window for thee.

The Light That Sells On Sight.

The ARC-LIGHT is something new. All need it, all buy it, all bless it. To show it means to sell it, and it yields from 100 per cent. to 300 per cent. profit to agents.

The same kind of carbon that gives the electric light its brilliancy is woven into the Arc-Light by a patent process. We hold affidavit showing that an Arc-Light burned 1040 hours, giving the last hour the same perfect, brilliant, light it gave the first.

A single lamp manufacturer in New England, who bought over 35,000 writes: "The Arc-Light beats all others. It sells our lamps, and turns night into day." Every saloon, hall, church, or home, store, hotel, car company will buy the Arc-Light Wick on sight. We have made arrangements with the manufacturers to introduce this wonderful discovery, and we offer for 60 days the following wholesale terms to agents:

FOR EVERY CORRECT ANSWER

IN making this marvellous offer, we have no desire to pose as benefactors. It is a business transaction to introduce CANDIED CRUSHED CARNATIONS, a delicious and fragrant breath perfume, and all who are awarded a Fountain Pen we require to distribute for us among friends 25 Sample Packages. In order that these may not be received by unappreciative people, we require you to collect 5 cents for each sample, and as this is to advertise, we send a PRIZE TICKET FREE with every package, which entitles each purchaser to a handsome piece of jewellery, which will not cost less than the Breath Perfume. After distributing the 25 Packages and Prize Tickets, you return our $1.25, thus fulfilling your agreement. We then give you for this service, free, and in addition to the Fountain Pen awarded you in the first place, a Solid Gold Shell Ring, beautifully engraved, and all who answer this within three days from when seen first, we send with ring, ALSO free, a Simulative Diamond, Ruby and Saphire Stick Pin.

To many this unparalleled offer may seem impracticable. To such we say it is certainly worth investigating. The risk is nothing. We ask none of your money. We are liberal enough to offer inducements to stimulate our industries never attempted by any similar firm, and we simply ask you to interpret our Puzzle and Send your Address. We award you the Fountain Pen and send, postage paid, 25 Sample Packages of Breath Perfume. Distribute them as instructed, and we give you also the Solid Gold Shell Ring and Pin. Nothing could be more fair. Persons alive to their own interests should avail themselves of this great offer at once.

CONDUCTED BY REGULUS.

IN THE scheme for the LUNATION or new moon, which occurs at about 18 minutes past five o'clock in the morning of the 8rd of November, this year, the last part of the sign Libra will be ascending and the 1st degree of Leo will be culminating. The moon overtakes the sun just before sunrise, in the Ascendant, where also both the benefics Jupiter and Venus are found; Mercury is conjoined with Mars near the 2d cusp and the other two malefics, Saturn and Herschel, are in the 2d house.

The conjoined luminaries being found in the Ascendant together with the greater and lesser benefics, Jupiter and Venus, is very promising for the public health and the general welfare of the people, though the malefics in the 2d house indicate heavy drafts upon the Nation's treasury and points to controversy and adverse criticism of administration methods by political opponents; unusual excitement in political circles over the currency question or the financiering of the nation with more than usual scolding by fault finders who have political axes to grind; some bad case of embezzlement of public money is indicated for the lunation; and malicious attack upon the authorities over their course in connection with postal matters. It is apprehended that there will be some atrccious crime committed or discovered involving poisoning, and accidental poisoning generally is to be guarded against through the middle days of the month. There will be unusual fluctuations in the money market in the last ten days of the month, which seem to usher in a season of extraordinary excitement involving strife, violence among lawless characters, strikes and disorders among railroad men, mechanics, or telegraph operators and probably some bad storms. More care than usual ought to be given to horses as there is probability of some disease of an epidemic character among them. Diseases among men involving the liver and the lungs are to be particularly guarded against.

CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR NOVEMBER, 1899.

NOVEMBER 1—Wednesday. The month opens with a superior day for nearly all affairs of consequence, but particularly for buying, selling, leasing or improving real estate or for the execution of deeds concerning such matters; also for dealings with masons, contractors and builders, shipwrights, plumbers, farmers, miners and generally those engaged in the dirty and laborious avocations; purchase coal, lumber, lime and agricultural products.

2—Thursday. Another of the bright days for all classes of commercial and mercantile transactions; purchase goods for trade execute writings of consequence for matters pertaining to money and with bankers, persons of wealth, judges, court officers, clergymen, and church trustees; deal in wool and woolen goods, church furnishings, and commercial paper.

3—Friday. Begin this day early and urge all business diligently; REGULUS particularly urges his friends in the intellectual pursuits to press their several vocations to the utmost, and recommends the day equally for the merchant, tradesman, and traveler; let the mind be employed to the fullest extent; let judges weigh testimony and decide important cases and lawyers take initiatory steps and urge proceedings in litigation of magnitude. An exception is urged here in above matters for persons born about the 19th of February, 21st of May, or 23rd of August, of past years, as the time is more likely to develop some troublesome experiences and to be less auspicious for new ventures in their lives. Such persons should beware of controversies and disputes and keep out of the way of harm from fire, explosions, or animals of vicious nature.

4—Saturday. Use the forenoon for principal steps in the elegant avocations; dealing in articles of dress, adornment and decoration; as the noon is passed, however, put a bridle on thy tongue, avoid haste in act and deed and do not engage in quarrels or controversies. Surgical operations, especially upon the female anatomy, better be postponed for a season, where possible, as highly inflammatory conditions prevail; travel not unnecessarily, defer correspondence, look out for fires, and see that no opportunity is given for thieves who will be especially active just at this time.

5—Sunday. A Sabbath likely to be noted for unusual nervous excitement and feverish activity; strange peculiarities, irritability and restlessness will be common; the mind at this period will specially incline towards the curious in science, art and mechanism and ingenious, new and unusual ideas are born and peculiar notions, whims and "isms" provoke discord and controversy; the time is generally unfavorable for persons born about the dates indicated in the 3rd paragraph, and is not to be taken by them for making any new beginning.

6—Monday. Strange occurrences baffle thine efforts during the first half of this day, and thou shouldst not make any application for favor or advantage from thy superior or persons engaged in trade in household goods or real estate.

7—Tuesday. Still an unfavorable time, recommending attention to routine matters only and forbidding much success in any new venture; don't place thyself in the way of harm from accidents; look out for fires and vicious animals, exercising more than usual care if compelled to be about machinery or in underground places; there are likely to be some bad accidents from falling walls or debris, by which human lives are endangered.

8—Wednesday. This day introduces a train of much bettered conditions, inviting the active pursuit of business and the vigorous prosecution of all honorable ventures; use the forenoon particularly for thy dealings with banks and the monied world, making collections, buying goods for trade, and otherwise employing all thine energies for the financial welfare.

9—Thursday. Another one of the best days of the month, to be fully improved for all honorable undertakings in life. It is especially favorable for the artistic and decorative callings; for music and paintings; also for milling operations, metal working and the extensive manufacture, purchase or sale of machinery, drugs and chemicals; also patented articles, electrical apparatus, brass and iron work, fire-arms, etc.; do correspondence of consequence; apply for patents, trade marks, and copyrights, and generally urge the literary engagements in the afternoon.

10—Friday. Avoid money speculations in the forenoon of this day; invest not thy capital in merchandise for trade and part with thy means sparingly; the afternoon is more favorable and invites activity in matters pertaining to houses and lands or their improvement.

11—Saturday. The influences of this day are of rather a treacherous character and it will be better to defer matters of much importance until a more propitious day. To the fair the influences for a few days are ominous of mischief and REGULUS warns them against deceit in the social walks of life. The female sex meet strange and unfortunate experiences unless on guard and encounter mischievous conditions for health, especially if born about the 24th of February or May, or the 27th of August or November, of past years. Proprietors of theaters and other places of amusement should beware of making engagements on this day and should be on the alert against injury to their interests.

12—Sunday. The day is peculiarly propitious for religious exercises, though the late afternoon inclines to melancholy and forbids thee to expect much pleasure in associations with aged persons.

13—Monday. Improve this day for all ingenious and mechanical trades and avocations, especially for chemical experiments and processes and electrical ventures, and the day generally for dealings with surgeons, dentists, military men, cutlers, manufacturers, and all who deal in or employ sharp instruments or fire in their avocations. Use the day also for seeking favor from public officers and persons in charge of public works.

14—Tuesday. Arise betimes and push all manner of business to the utmost; prosecute mathematical and scientific studies; deal with printers, booksellers, and all engaged in the literary callings and the ingenious occupations; do important correspondence, travel and make contracts; commercial men are especially favored; choose not the day, however, for courtship or marriage.

15—Wednesday. A day not conducive to progress in any direction though it is by no means unfavorable for any of the general transactions of life.

16—Thursday. Give preference to the forenoon hours for all commercial transactions and literary efforts, also for the prosecution of matters concerned with the fine arts; music, painting and the drama are favored; have care, however, as the afternoon advances that you do not indulge in foolish and unnecessary expenditures; do not buy goods for trade.

17—Friday. Not to be depended upon; have unusual care in loaning thy signature or giving credit in business; the day is best devoted to routine matters only.

18—Saturday. An evil forenoon; form no hasty conclusions in business; litigation and contention are likely to interfere seriously with the happy outcome of affairs of magnitude or importance now begun; be not rash in thought or act and scrutinize carefully all business enterprises now presenting themselves; seek not promotion in public positions nor give offence to thine employer; keep out of quarrels and have no dealings in wearing apparel or any kind of artistic goods; let all special entertainments be temperate and violent experiences guarded against.

19—Sunday. A day inviting patience, forbearance, rest and quiet.

20—Monday. Strange annoyances or hindrances are likely to interfere with satisfactory prosecution of general business, but as the noon is passed let the best efforts of the day be put forth.

21—Tuesday. Begin this day with the dawn for it is one of excellent promise, especially for the merchant and traveler; the forenoon hours being really the best for money dealings, the beginnings of great and noble undertakings, entering upon new business and pushing that already established; have money negotiations and deal with persons of wealth and station.

22—Wednesday. A passive day in which local conditions contribute little impulse; improve vigorously the benevolent indications of thy nativity.

23—Thursday. The inventive faculties are now unusually acute and some remarkable discovery in electrical apparatus or in chemical matters is likely at this time; conditions on this day are favorable for the elegant and artistic engagements; let the artist and musician vigorously urge their pursuits; seek pleasure and amusement from the drama or the social entertainment in the evening.

24—Friday. Bargain for real estate at this time, when also commence affairs of importance for improvement to landed property; deal with farmers, miners, plumbers, nurserymen and cattle raisers; do not seek favor from thy superior in the afternoon.

25—Saturday. Have no dealings with usurers or very old or eccentric persons nor expect much consideration from officers or employees of railways or in government positions.

26—Sunday. A quarrelsome and contentious Sabbath, inviting patience in a remarkable degree; the religious discourse will be aggressive and controversial and marked by haste and false logic. Let all persons born about the 10th of March, June, September, or December, of past years, look carefully to their affairs lest by their recklessness or haste they become involved in litigation and experience misfortune or loss, or in some cases suffer violent hurts or diseases; such persons are now generally excitable, contentious and quarrelsome; they are admonished that patience and discretion will prove profitable allies in the present juncture of their affairs; the fair sex are peculiarly under a ban and we shall read of some unusual excitement over deeds of violence suffered.

27—Monday. Urge business vigorously on this day; deal with government officials and large corporate interests; apply for patents and hasten trade in patented articles.

28—Tuesday. Give preferences to this day for mechanical and inventive efforts and for dealing in metals, chemicals, glassware, hardware, cutlery, and electrical materials and machinery. Manufacturing enterprises are encouraged and surgical operations and chemical experiments succeed.

29—Wednesday. One of the very excellent days of the month, which REGULUS recommends to his friends for the inauguration of their most important ventures in the passing life, especially if they pertain to the elegant occupations or the polite arts; have transactions concerning houses and lands and their improvements in the forenoon hours, when also give thine efforts to the literary affairs; sign contracts, do correspondence, hire help and travel.

30—Thursday. Conditions are decidedly baffling on this day and it is better to defer matters of much importance until a more promising time; beware of visionary schemes for suddenly becoming wealthy; as, if they present themselves at this time, they are likely to be delusive and untrustworthy.
